CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

FORTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

they have at this time. They have now a force, between their clerical force and their laborers, messengers, &c., of one hundred and sixty-one. We propose in this bill to give them one hundred and sixty-eight.

Now, it is a fact, Mr. Chairman, known to this House that there are to-day one hundred and twenty millions of acres of public lands already surveyed that are not pre-empted, that have not been taken up, that are not settled; one hundred and twenty millions of acres. And, sir, I want to say more that the Committee on Appropriations felt that it was their duty under the authority which has been so much denounced in this House to undertake to make some reform in this direction. But we are frank to say to the House that the subject was such a heavy and such an intricate one that, after having pondered over it several days and after having made considerable investigation into the matter, we declined to undertake this work. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that there is a necessity for a reform in the General Land Office, and I will be frank to say that I do not know but perhaps that reform might even necessitate temporarily a somewhat increased clerical force in the Land Office here in Washington. That might be so; and I am not prepared to say now that we have given altogether as much force as the office might possibly need and which might be well utilized. That may be true. But, sir, we were aware of the fact that several bills had been introduced into the House for the purpose of reforming the whole land system, voluminous bills; bills, too, drawn with great care. I had the honor myself to introduce one which was drawn by the Commissioner of the Land Office. I introduced it at his request, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. What has been done with it I do not know. We have had no report from the committee. But I have been informed privately that some members of that committee propose to offer amendments to this bill touching the subject to which I am now addressing myself, the reform of the Land Office.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] that I think he is a little extravagant; he is asking too much clerical force, I think. In my judgment, we had better not increase the clerical force at this time, but wait and see what additional legislation there may be with regard to this whole subject, and after the House has taken action on the subject, has decided what course it will take in regard to it, it will then be time enough to adjust the clerical force to the action that may be had.

Mr. DUNNELL. One word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. I have only asked in my amendment that the clerks of class 3, of whom eighteen are provided for in the bill, be increased to twenty-two, the number estimated for; that the thirty-five clerks of the second class be increased to forty, and that the sixty clerks of class 1 be increased to seventy. Those are precisely the numbers estimated for by the Department.

Mr. ATKINS. We have reclassified these clerks, and in the reclassification we have given seven more than the law now gives.

Mr. FOSTER. I move pro forma to strike out the last word, for the purpose merely of adding a word to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The chairman and my other associates on the committee will remember that if the legislation proposed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office is adopted, then there will have to be new estimates for clerks, so as to make the appropriation in conformity with the law; so that I think the gentleman from Minnesota would do well to wait until we see what the House may do with the proposed amendments to the Land Office system.

Mr. DUNNELL. We shall be in a pretty condition to bring that up at this stage of the session.

Mr. ATKINS. We shall be willing to go back to this section. We do not desire to take any advantage.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say further that my impression is, and it is a very strong one, that the force in the General Land Office is not sufficient. I agreed to the present arrangement because I felt that until some reformation was made in the matters relating to the Land Office it had better stand as it is, but I shall be perfectly willing to go back to it in case any legislation shall be taken by Congress.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will prevail. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] that in the Forty-third Congress a bill was matured for the organization of the Land Office, but it was brought in by the chairman of the committee during the last week of the session and could not be passed under a suspension of the rules.

The Committee on Public Lands may not be called again during the present session. In the Forty-fourth Congress an attempt was made to pass a bill reorganizing the General Land Office, but it failed to pass, and there is no likelihood that the House will pass any such bill during the present session. The Land Office has estimated for the clerks who are included in the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, and if we desire the business of that office kept up we ought to furnish them with the necessary clerical force. Patents for land are not now issued, and to-day the transfer of land cannot be made in States and Territories. Cases in contest are being held for three, four, five, and ten years, and the whole business of the people in connection with lands is held in this shape for the want of a few clerks. Is there any economy in that? I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota how many additional clerks his amendment proposes to allow.

Mr. DUNNELL. Nineteen.

Mr. DURHAM. That makes a difference of twenty-eight over the present force, as I can demonstrate in a minute.

Mr. DUNNELL. I only ask for nineteen.

Mr. ATKINS. But the bill increases the force seven.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have nothing else to do with the bill except that part of it which I want to amend.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; I hope the House will have something to do with it.

The question was put upon Mr. DUNNELL's amendment; and on a division, there were—ayes 64, noes 64, no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. DUNNELL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 80.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out the word "sixty," in line 153, and insert in lieu thereof "seventy;" so that it will read: "seventy clerks of class 1."

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman if that is not a part of the amendment which he offered just now and which the committee voted down.

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes, it is.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I raise the point of order that the committee have already acted upon it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand that I am denied the privilege of offering a portion of a former amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. I submit that the House has just voted on the same proposition.

Mr. DUNNELL. No, it is not the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not the same; not having been voted on separately, it is now in order.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that if he will wait until we get through with the subject and see what action the House takes upon the proposed amendments to the land system, if it should take any, then I shall be willing to recur to this paragraph, and perhaps a few additional clerks might be well allowed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am willing to concede to the gentleman from Tennessee, who I think proposes to be fair; but there is this difficulty about it: I do not understand that there is anything certain about our legislation here. This appropriation bill will have passed and become a law before we can get through with general legislation.

Now, in regard to the passage of the general bill, every year there has come from the Commissioner of the General Land Office a general bill to reorganize the department. I had the honor to serve for four years upon the Committee on Public Lands, and every year the Commissioner sent in a bill for the reorganization of the department, and every year since I have been here that bill has died, and never been heard of after it was given into the hands of the committee. I believe it was once brought up in the House. If I could foresee that we would have positive, affirmative legislation upon the subject, I would agree to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee; but it is all in the dark and the future.

Mr. ATKINS. Is not the gentleman willing to accept an amendment providing for sixty-five clerks of class 1, sixty-five more than this bill now provides? The subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations are willing to agree to that.

Mr. DUNNELL. Very well; I will agree to that.

Mr. PAGE. How many were there last year?

Mr. DUNNELL. There were seventy; the committee have cut it down ten.

Mr. ATKINS. There were only forty last year.

Mr. DUNNELL. There were seventy clerks last year where you now propose by this bill to give sixty.

The amendment, as modified, was then agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the total in lines 1459 and 1460 by striking out "$212,560" and inserting "$218,560."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Indian Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,000; five clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; one stenographer, at $1,200; eight clerks of class 2; eight clerks of class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; ten copyists, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; one page, $480; and one laborer; in all, $65,120.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to strike out "three thousand" and insert "four thousand" as the compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order upon that amendment that it is an increase of compensation.

Mr. SPARKS. I suppose it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the words "five clerks of class 4" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for chief of the finance division, $2,250; four clerks of class 4."

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. It is creating a new office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the word "six" before the words "clerks of class 3" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eight;" also by striking out the word "eight" and inserting the word "ten" before the words "clerks of class 2;" and striking out the word "eight" and inserting the word "nine" before the words "clerks of class 1." The amendment which I offer provides for five additional clerks.

Mr. DURHAM. Hold on; the point of order is reserved on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will state it.

Mr. DURHAM. It increases the compensation.

Mr. HASKELL. It makes no increase of compensation at all.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, it increases the number of clerks.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to have the gentleman show the law which provides that there cannot be detailed, as proposed by my amendment, two additional clerks in class 3 in the accounts division, two additional clerks in the land division, and one additional clerk in the files and records division. What law is there on the statute-book to prevent that additional clerical force being provided?

Mr. DURHAM. I will respond to my friend by saying that he must show the law which authorizes it. It is for him to show the affirmative of the proposition, and not for me to show the negative.

Mr. HASKELL. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.] He raised the point of order and he must establish that point.

Mr. DURHAM. I say there is no law authorizing this increase, and the amendment of the gentleman proposes to make a new law, not in the interest of economy.

Mr. HASKELL. Upon that point of order let me say this: it is absolutely impossible with the present force employed there to do business with the Indian Bureau in the land division, in the record division, and in the accounts division. It is absolutely impossible to do the work. Anybody familiar with the early history of my State knows that it was dotted all over with Indian reservations. He knows, too, that to-day there is hardly an Indian reservation in that State, where the Indian titles have been extinguished. I have before this House some fifteen or twenty measures——

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] made a point of order on this amendment, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] is discussing the merits of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] to confine his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. Well, I simply desire to say that I want to see that point of order established by the honorable gentleman who raises it. I do not stand here to hunt up the statutes of the United States to prove that there is no prohibition existing against my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this point: not whether there is a law forbidding his amendment, but whether there is any law authorizing the employment of the additional force for which his amendment provides.

Mr. HASKELL. I cannot say as to that. If it is in violation of of law, then, if the present Congress desires to make the increase to authorize the employment of these additional clerks, it can do so by adopting my amendment. I cannot tell whether or not there is a provision upon the statute-books that says there shall be employed in the several divisions of the Indian Bureau just so many clerks and no more. I insist that it is no point of order to charge that there is such a provision of law, and then, without producing the authority showing my amendment to be contrary to law, to seek to obtain a ruling upon it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to say a single word upon the point of order. I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] is entirely wrong in the legal position which he assumes. Because a bill is reported providing for so many clerks it does not follow that therefore there is no power in this Committee of the Whole to increase that number of clerks.

The gentleman from Kansas has offered an amendment to increase the number. The gentleman from Kentucky raises a point of order that this is new legislation, in conflict with legislation already existing; and he then calls upon the gentleman from Kansas to show that the point of order is not well taken. This certainly is an unheard of and unreasonable position. The gentleman from Kentucky occupies now the affirmative position and must show that the grounds on which he bases his point exist. If he fails to show this the point of order is not well taken. The presumption is not in his favor; the facts must be produced, and until they are produced they are to be regarded as not existing. The position of the gentleman from Kansas is certainly well taken and is unanswerable.

Mr. CASWELL. One word on the question of order. I think it will be conceded that there is no law fixing the number of clerkships. Is it not then a mistake to suppose that this amendment changes existing law? It is in order unless it does so; and there is no law fixing the number of clerks in the Department to which the amendment refers. Therefore it is perfectly in order. We have had precedent after precedent here all day for changing the number of clerks, because there is no law limiting or fixing the number.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair assumes that the clerks provided for in this appropriation bill are provided for in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. PAGE. That is a violent presumption.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the clerks provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas——

Mr. CASWELL. One word before the Chair announces his decision. Is it not to be supposed that the situation of these Departments changes from year to year, and that consequently there must be each year a change in the number of clerks necessary to transact the business? Does it not follow that upon every appropriation bill from year to year the number must be varied?

The CHAIRMAN. That may be true; yet if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas proposes clerks in addition to the number now provided by law, the point of order is good.

Mr. CASWELL. To come within the prohibition of the rule an amendment must change existing law, and there is no provision fixing or limiting the number of these clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes that there is some law fixing the number of clerks——

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a single point. He says he assumes there is a provision of law fixing the number of clerks; and under this provision of law assumed to exist, my amendment is to be ruled out of order. Now I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to produce that law which debars me from the privilege of submitting to this Committee of the Whole a just and equitable amendment and having it fairly considered.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kansas will produce any law authorizing the employment of these clerks, the Chair will entertain the amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. There is no law upon the subject except the last appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the number provided for in this bill correspond with the bill of last year?

Mr. DURHAM. It does not.

Mr. CASWELL. If there is no law upon the subject, we have the right to make one.

The CHAIRMAN. But not on an appropriation bill, unless the proposition is germane and at the same time reduces expenses.

Mr. CASWELL. If it does not change or conflict with the existing law, we may do it.

Mr. HASKELL. Let me call attention to the provision just attached to this bill by which five additional clerks were authorized in the Land Office.

Mr. DURHAM. Why did not the gentleman make a point of order on that?

Mr. HASKELL. I plead with the committee simply to hear me upon the merits of the measure which I introduce for its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to make a suggestion on the point of order. I understand the point to be that there is no law authorizing an additional number of clerks, though the heads of Departments may deem them to be necessary. Now I call the attention of the Chair and of members of the Committee on Appropriations to section 169 of the Revised Statutes:

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employés, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

This provision of law covers the case exactly. The laws organizing the different Departments were not intended to lay down any specific number of clerks for each Department; but it is left discretionary with Congress in the annual appropriations bills, as the business of the Departments may vary, to conform to the requirements of that business by making either an addition or a reduction in the number of employés.

Mr. DURHAM. The statute which has been read simply authorizes so many clerks as may be provided for; and the number proposed in this amendment was not provided for in the last appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] does not seem to apply to this case at all, but only to the case of clerks provided for by law.

Mr. MILLS. The language of the statute is as broad as it possibly can be. It covers all clerks that may be necessary in the Departments.

The CHAIRMAN. It only refers to such as are already provided for by existing law.

Mr. MILLS. The language is:

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law—

That is classes 1, 2, 3, and 4—

> as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to hold in abeyance the point of order. The gentleman from Kansas desires to make a statement and I have no objection to hear his statement and reserve the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. Very good; I would as soon argue my amendment now as subsequently. The amendment I propose is to give to the Indian Bureau two additional clerks in the division of accounts, two in the land division, and one in the file and records division.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the gentleman send his amendment up and have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1477 strike out the words "six clerks" and insert "eight clerks;" in line 1479, after the word "dollars," strike out "eight clerks" and insert "ten clerks;" after the word "two," strike out "eight clerks" and insert "nine clerks."

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, those clerks, if agreed to on the part of this House, or on the part of Congress, will be detailed as follows, (and this I have from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself, with whom I talked in reference to this matter:) two in the division of accounts, two in the land division, and one in the files and records division.

As I was saying when interrupted by the point of order, my State in its early day was covered with Indian reservations. There was more land by three times in my district that was under Indian title than there was owned by the Government of the United States. There is hardly one of these old Indian titles which has been extinguished. It is more the duty of the present delegation in this House from Kansas to present to Congress measures touching the settlement of these old land questions than any other we have to perform. All the bills introduced of most importance to our people are on this subject.

I submitted to the Indian Bureau a communication November 16 asking for the investigation of the law and the treaty with reference to one single case in my district in order that I might refer it to the Judiciary Committee as supporting a resolution I had introduced. I never received a reply to that. I could not secure a reply to that until nearly the last of March, not on account of any fault of this office, but because they were completely covered with work. Mr. Holcomb, chief clerk of the Indian Bureau, told me if he should attend diligently and strictly to the legitimate business that the Kansas delegation could bring before that land division of the Indian Bureau it would take all of its time. I ask that additional clerks be put there. I ask increase of no salary; I ask that this accounts division, to which I have to apply almost every day in the settlement of claims for my State, shall have one additional clerk in order that I may be able to present the business for my people. That is all. To day I cannot do it. To-day no man can get his work promptly through that Indian Bureau because of the lack of clerical force.

I appeal to every Delegate on this floor, I appeal to every western member on this floor who has had business with that Indian Bureau, to say whether he will not bear me out in the statement that it is impossible to get our work through.

I ask for five additional clerks, and I ask it by request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I am thoroughly acquainted with these three divisions of the Indian Office. I know each one of the clerks. I have stood by their desks. I have looked over their papers. I know the work. I know the necessity for these five additional clerks. I ask not to put in any pets, not to pay increased salaries, not to run into any extravagant expense, but in order to give the necessary clerical force to do the legitimate work of that bureau, which can be done nowhere else.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HASKELL. Very well; I will hear it.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas, during the discharge of the business of his constituents at the Indian Bureau, how many times he found the Commissioner there himself. How many times did he find the Commissioner there employed in the duties of his office in the last three or four months? How much time does the Commissioner spend there ordinarily?

Mr. HASKELL. I do not know.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Is he not usually in New York?

Mr. HASKELL. I cannot reply as to the number of times he has been present or absent. I do not want to involve myself.

Mr. CASWELL. I wish to refer to Rule 120, to be found on page 130, and to that part of the rule which is strictly in point:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

I understand the Chairman to suggest the appropriation bill which fixes the number of clerks may be regarded as the existing law. Let me say in reply the number of clerks fixed in any given appropriation bill would extend and apply only to that year, and at the end of that year for which appropriation was made that law would cease to exist. It is not a general enactment which is to fix the number of clerks from year to year. It applies only to the very bill itself, which is the appropriation bill. And now we are to start out for a new year; and it is perfectly germane and proper that we fix the number of clerks in the bill for whom appropriations are to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if the number of clerks embraced in the amendment is in excess of the number fixed in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir; there is one additional clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. All the others are provided for in that bill but one?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. I have had something to do with that Department, and while I could not say the chief of that bureau does not desire additional force, yet it does seem somewhat strange to me from my relations with the office that I have not been acquainted with it. That, however, is merely a kind of negative testimony against it.

One thing is certain—and I speak now for the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member—that nothing authoritative has come to that committee from this bureau desiring an increase of force; and it is hardly fair to come in here asking for an increase of some six clerks without even a letter from the Commissioner or without any desire expressed on the part of that bureau for an increase of force.

I specially desire, however, to do justice to the Indian Commissioner. Some reflections have been cast upon him I think and I believe they are unjust. I think the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is a man of ability and integrity, and I take pleasure in stating that to the House.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman will allow me a moment I desire to ask him does he refer to me as having made any imputation upon the Commissioner?

Mr. SPARKS. Oh, no, sir; I did not refer to you.

Mr. HASKELL. I certainly did not intend to make any imputation.

Mr. SPARKS. But I understood there were some insinuations—I do not know from whom.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. SPARKS. Some gentlemen make the inquiry whether the gentleman from Kansas ever found the Commissioner in his office?

Mr. WIGGINTON. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that question?

Mr. SPARKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIGGINTON. For about two weeks I have been nearly every day at the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the purpose of seeing him on important business, and I found he was in New York. My experience is he does not spend half of his time in his office.

Mr. SPARKS. I cannot yield any further. I want to state for the benefit of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—I am not his apologist; he is not of my political faith or of my political family—but I wish to say that I have worked with him for many months until twelve o'clock at night on the Indian appropriation bill. Now, I think that is very good work; and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] who was my colleague on the subcommittee, will confirm what I have stated, although I was there many nights when he was not.

I understand that when this gentleman consented to accept the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs he did it with the distinct understanding that there was some business he had to dispose of, and he has recently been absent a good deal attending to that business. He is absent to-day, to my knowledge; and it is hardly fair to a gentleman accepting an office under the circumstances he did charging himself with every day of his absence, and taking the office on the understanding he had some unfinished business he had to dispose of, it is hardly fair under such circumstances to charge him with want of attention to his office. I am told—and I want to state this for his benefit—that, this business disposed of, he can devote the whole of his attention to his office. I do not think it is proper there should be any increase of the force of that office, and I do not think it is just to that officer that there should be any aspersions cast upon him.

Mr. DURHAM. I now insist on my point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. Before that point of order is decided I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read a memorandum which may serve as an answer to the proposition of the gentleman who has just concluded his remarks, that there is no letter from the Indian Commissioner requesting this additional force. In print that might read as if the gentleman had some little lack of faith in my word. That I know is not the case, and I send this memorandum to the Clerk's desk to be read with this statement, that it was written, by the direction of the Commissioner of the Indian Office, by the chief clerk of that office, and handed to me as a memorandum to be used in offering this amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. Directed by the Commissioner?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Why was it not sent to the Committee on Appropriations?

The Clerk read as follows:

The five extra clerks required for the Indian Bureau will be detailed for duty as follows: two in the accounts division, two in the land division, and one in the files and records division.

Mr. SPARKS. I certainly did not insinuate that the gentleman from Kansas had stated anything that was not true. I simply stated that that office had not communicated to the Committee on Appropriations the desire for this additional force; and it struck me as strange that it should have been communicated in this way to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to decide upon the point of order. The Chair understands that the clerical force provided for in the last appropriation bill is the lawful force. The money appropriated to pay that force of course only lasts that year, but the force itself is fixed by that law, and, as the Chair understands there is some excess in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas over that force, the Chair would be bound to sustain the point of order. If the gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment keeping the force within the number provided in the last appropriation act, the Chair will receive it.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry? How could we change the number of clerks in the several Departments? Would we do it by a general enactment fixing the number of clerks in each bureau? Did the Chair ever know of such a law passing Congress?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been a great many changes in the number of clerks made in this bill, but no objection was made; but when the point of order is raised the Chair is bound to rule such an amendment as this out of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that this debate is out of order.

Mr. HASKELL. Is it in order to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HASKELL. I then most respectfully, for the sake of having this question settled authoritatively, believing it to be an important one, appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is an appeal in order in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The Chair has ruled that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, on the point of order, made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] is not in order, and the gentleman from Kansas takes an appeal. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the Chair will state the proposition which he has decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will again be read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a question of privilege. I ask that the law upon which the Chair rules be read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a question of privilege. The Chair rules upon the law as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, that the last appropriation bill fixes the number of clerks in this bureau.

Mr. THOMPSON. I suggest that the Chair should not rule upon the statement of a member as to a law which is in print. I ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment proposes an appropriation for a number of clerks in excess of the number provided by the last appropriation bill and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CASWELL. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one question of order pending and the Chair cannot entertain another.

Mr. CASWELL. I am only asking a parliamentary question. How could it be that the last appropriation bill fixed the number if it could not be done in an appropriation bill?

Mr. ATKINS. I submit that debate is not in order.

Mr. FOSTER. Is not the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the Chair restate his ruling to the House, and I think its absurdity will be seen by the restatement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules upon information. The Chair has not read the law.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is my point; that the law must be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the number of clerks proposed in the amendment is in excess of the number provided for by law, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAYES. Let us have the existing law read.

Mr. PAGE. The Chair bases its decision upon a law, and is it not our right to have the law read?

Mr. THOMPSON. The appeal is based upon two points: first, a fact is denied and then the law.

Mr. HAYES. An appropriation bill is no law.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] will send up the law it will be read.

Mr. HASKELL. Upon the question of the appeal I desire to say a few words. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole has asked me to bring forward some law. I offered an amendment and it was subjected to a point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that the appeal is not debatable.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the Clerk to read the rule which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HASKELL. When that point of order is settled I will then proceed with my remarks.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that the appeal is not debatable after the Chair had arisen to put the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Questions of order decided by the Speaker shall be subject to an appeal to the House by any two members, on which appeal no member shall speak more than once, except by leave of the House.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, upon the question of the appeal that I take from the decision of the Chair to the judgment of the committee, I desire to say that I moved an amendment to the pending bill; that upon that amendment a point of order was raised that it exceeded in number the clerks authorized to be employed under existing law. The gentleman who raised that point of order was bound by all parliamentary law and all court proceedings to establish that fact; he failed to establish it; but the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole demands, on the contrary, that the burden of proof shall be lifted from the person who made the point of order, from the one who alleges the fact, from the plaintiff in the case, and thrown upon him upon whom the point of order was made.

Now, then, further, it is stated that my amendment is in excess of the provisions of law regulating the employment of these clerks. I deny it; it has never been put before the chairman of the Committee of the Whole; I deny the fact. On the contrary, the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] read to you the general statute covering the case. There is not a man upon this floor who in sober second thought will dare to say that the last appropriation bill, because it happened to designate four clerks, fixed the number of clerks to be employed for all time to come. The last appropriation bill was simply an act of Congress appropriating money to pay the number of clerks then employed; that is all. It goes no further than that; it binds nobody beyond that.

The next appropriation bill can make an appropriation for ten clerks, and under the general law read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] the Secretary of the Interior having an appropriation for ten clerks can employ that number. It was in the face of these propositions that the honorable Chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled that the point of order taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] unsubstantiated by fact, unsubstantiated by any law, was a good point of order and well taken. From that decision I respectfully appeal.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If I understand correctly the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, it is that the last appropriation bill fixes the number of employés, and also provides for their payment during the year; and that any provision now introduced which increases the number of employés beyond what the last appropriation bill fixed would be in violation of the rule, in that it increased appropriations and was not in the direction of economy.

Mr. HASKELL. That would be good as applied to this year, the year for which the last appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole is right in his decision. The last appropriation bill does fix the number of employés, and goes a little further and provides that that number shall be paid for one year.

Mr. FOSTER. This bill is for the next year.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Of course this bill is for the next year. But this House does not possess the power to increase the number beyond the law of last year. In other words the law of last year fixed the number; it is under the provision of the general law.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if the number of clerks in this bureau is fixed by any law, either by the appropriation bill to which he refers, or by any prior law? If not, then it seems to me it is in order to move an amendment to this bill to appropriate for any number of clerks not in excess of the number which the law permits.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I would like to say a word.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The words in that act are, "as recognized by law." What law? The last law, of course.

Mr. HASKELL. Oh no.

Mr. CASWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] how we can change that law?

Mr. DURHAM. Rather than have all this discussion I would prefer to withdraw my point of order and let the amendment be voted down, as I believe it will be, by the Committee of the Whole. I therefore withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn the question will be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] which is open to debate.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to recall the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the amendment which I have offered. It is an amendment suggested by the Commissioner of the Indian Bureau himself; the distribution of clerks as proposed by that amendment was dictated by himself. I am thoroughly familiar with the three divisions sought to be re-enforced by the amendment. I say that this force is absolutely necessary and essential to the performance of the work of the bureau. I myself have information legitimately as a member of this body showing that it is important that the bureau shall have these additional clerks.

I appeal confidently to every member on this floor who has any business with the Indian Bureau, and to every Delegate from the Territories who may have a seat upon this floor, to bear me out in the statement that these five additional clerks are essential to the economical administration of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman how it is that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs came to make this request of him?

Mr. HASKELL. I presume that it was beyond any doubt because I have, if not more business, at least as much business with the Indian Bureau to-day as any member upon this floor. It was because I have some ten or twelve bills now pending before committees of this House, and the information for the use of the committees considering those bills can only come from the Indian Bureau. My people border upon the Indian Territory; they sell largely and buy largely across the State line. My district is full of claims and of business that must necessarily be brought before the Indian Bureau, and I am there every day.

Because of these reasons, the Commissioner of the Indian Bureau has become well acquainted with me. Then, too, he was not here in the city all the time while this bill was in process of preparation. He was absent from the city about the time the bill was brought into the House. When I asked him if the Committee on Appropriations had given him the five additional clerks that he and I had been talking about, he said they had not. He gave me this memorandum and asked me to present the matter to the House.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Was this memorandum given to you by the Commissioner himself, or by his chief clerk?

Mr. HASKELL. It was given to me by his chief clerk, at the direction of the Commissioner.

Mr. WIGGINTON. One further question, if you please.

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Do you not think that if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs would devote his whole time to his business he could get along with less clerks?

Mr. HASKELL. I think not. The work that comes ont of the bureau is done by the clerks below. Whether he is there all the time or not I do not think would affect the business of the land division, or of the accounts division, or of the record and file division. The work must be done by the clerks.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to state for the information of the House that the Committee on Indian Affairs has sought and obtained a great deal of information in reference to the business before it from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the committee has yet to receive any intimation that he desired an increase of his force. Time and again I have talked with him in person; time and again I have corresponded with him, and although now and then he has complained that he had a great deal of work to do, I am unable to recall any intimation from him that he desired an enlargement in the force of his bureau. I now hear that suggestion for the first time to-day. I hope this increase will not be allowed.

Mr. ATKINS. We have given the Commissioner of Indian Affairs all the force that was estimated for. The only difference is that we have reclassified it; and I see no reason why we should change the classification so far as the Indian Bureau is concerned, unless we are to change it with regard to all the other bureaus and Departments of the Government. We have given the Indian department one more employé than the present law authorizes.

In confirmation of what has been said by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I wish to say that neither from that gentleman nor from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] the chairman of the subcommittee charged with the preparation of the Indian appropriation bill, nor from any other quarter, have we heard of any request on the part of the Indian Commissioner for an increase of force. My friend from Kansas has been more fortunate in obtaining information from that bureau than the rest of us. That, of course, is our misfortune. I am sorry the Commissioner did not bring the matter to our attention in a more formal way. Even the little paper which has been read is without any name to it. As my friend from Kansas indorses it, of course it cannot be called anonymous; but without his indorsement it would be an anonymous affair altogether.

Mr. HASKELL. I did not send up this paper as any authoritative declaration from the Commissioner, but simply as a basis on which to state a fact. I pledge my word as a member of the House that what I have stated is true.

Mr. ATKINS. Nobody intimates any doubt of that.

Mr. HASKELL. I do not like to hear it urged time and again by members of the Committee on Appropriations that they have heard nothing about this from the Commissioner. So far as their statements concern themselves, they are all right; but my statement is true that I was asked to do exactly this thing in response to numerous petitions I have made for the more speedy working through of my business before that Bureau.

Mr. ATKINS. We all understand that.

The question being taken upon the amendment of Mr. HASKELL, there were—ayes 68, noes 82.

Mr. HASKELL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HASKELL and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 90.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope not. Let us sit a little longer.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FINLEY. In my remarks this morning on the appropriation for the Surgeon-General's Office I referred to certain statements which I had obtained from that office. I ask consent to make those statements a part of my remarks, and also to extend my remarks.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $2,250; twenty clerks of class 4; forty clerks of class 3; sixty clerks of class 2; one hundred clerks of class 1; thirty-four clerks, at $1,000 each; one skilled mechanic, at $1,200; fifty-five copyists, at $900 each; one engineer at $1,200, and one assistant engineer, at $1,000; seven assistant messengers; six pages, at $480 each; and for laborers and watchmen, $6,000; in all, $412,670.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by inserting the words "and thirty-five" after the word "hundred," in line 1493; and by striking out "twelve" in line 1501 and inserting "fifty-four," so as to make the total correspond.

This amendment provides for thirty-five additional clerks of class 1. The Committee on Appropriations have agreed to offer this amendment in order to enable the Pension Bureau to perform whatever duty may be necessary in regard to applications by soldiers of the war of 1812 for pensions. These applications are now coming in at the rate of seven thousand to eight thousand a month; and the Commissioner of Pensions says that this increased force will be necessary in order to enable him to discharge properly the work of his office.

Mr. FOSTER. Would not a point of order lie against this amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman chooses to raise that question——

Mr. FOSTER. I do not make any point of order. I was only suggesting the absurdity of the position which gentlemen have been taking.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt that a point of order would lie against any proposition to increase the force above what the law allows.

Mr. ATKINS. Rule 120 is a very good one to exclude bad legislation; and nobody ought to want to exclude good legislation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LYNDE. I move to amend by striking out "$3,600," in line 1489, and inserting "$4,000," so as to make the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions $4,000.

Mr. SPARKS. I raise a point of order on this amendment. The same point was made upon my proposition to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I make the point that this amendment increases the compensation beyond what is fixed by law.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the point discussed if it is admitted that the amendment increases the salary fixed by law.

Mr. CASWELL. If the Chair will permit me to refer to a little history I think I can convince him that the amendment does not conflict with existing law. Up to 1873 the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions was fixed by law at $3,000. That was the law; the salary was fixed. At that time there passed into the bill known as the "salary grab" a provision which fixed his salary at $4,000. Soon after, as most gentlemen will remember, the Congress repealed the "salary-grab" law, and thereby repealed the law which fixed the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions. Since that time there has been no law fixing that salary. In the year following it was made by an appropriation $3,000. The years following it was paid by an appropriation at $3,600 tacked on to an appropriation bill, and I think the point of order was not made on it. If it was it was overruled. Up to this time it has been $3,600, which has been made in the appropriation bill. The point of order is not well taken when we seek to do simply just what we have done for years back, to appropriate for the coming year $4,000 as compensation for the Commissioner of Pensions. That is all. It has been appropriated for each year since 1873.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope my friend from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois what law provides for this?

Mr. CASWELL. It was provided for by law but that law has been repealed. Congress has not since that time re-enacted any other law on the subject except by making the appropriations for this salary in the appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. According to the gentleman from Wisconsin there is no law for it.

Mr. CASWELL. There is no general act fixing the compensation, but it has been provided for each year by the appropriation and nothing else. It is the law when you repeal an act which repeals some prior act that prior act is not revived. The repeal left it standing with no law on the subject. That is the way in which the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions stands to-day.

Mr. DURHAM. When the House comes to understand the law they will find it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I believe I have the floor, and I am sure my friend will not interpose his objection against the unanimous feeling of the House. I think he does himself injustice because his friend did not receive what he thought was right. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to refer to section 470 of the Revised Statutes, which I will read:

SEC. 470. There shall be in the Department of the Interior a Commissioner of Pensions, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to receive a salary of $4,000 a year.

That is the law now.

Mr. CASWELL. That has been repealed, but I am willing to accept it for the purpose of this amendment. I do not want my friend to be led into error, however. The section of the Revised Statutes which he reads has been repealed and has left the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions without any act of a like character.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. SPARKS. I do.

Mr. HANNA. I understand originally Congress by a general law fixed the salary at $4,000. That section has been read. I understand subsequently Congress repealed that act. Then the only law on the subject will be found in the last appropriation act and that appropriated so much. Am I correct? If I am in the fact that the general law fixing the compensation at $4,000 is repealed, then I submit the point of order raised by my friend from Illinois would not obtain.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the decision of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made no decision.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope order will be preserved so that we can hear what is going on. The confusion is so great it is utterly impossible to hear anything.

Mr. McMAHON. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that the committee had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, for two weeks, on account of important business;

To Mr. POLLARD, for ten days, on account of important business;

To Mr. CAMP, for two days; and

To Mr. POUND, until the 13th, on account of important business.

DANIEL M. MORLEY.

Mr. POUND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4670) to restore to the pension-rolls the name of Daniel M. Morley, of Morley, Barron County, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEOLOGICAL ATLAS OF COLORADO.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution directing the printing of 500 copies of the geological and geographical atlas of Colorado and adjacent Territories; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

SOLDIERS' REUNION AT DES MOINES, IOWA.

Mr. CUMMINGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Des Moines, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF FORCE IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the proposed reduction of force in his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RETURN OF PAPERS TO TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting the return to the files of that Department of certain papers; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

L. T. GREEN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the claim of L. T. Green, of Chattanooga, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ANSON MILLS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the claim of Anson Mills; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FRAUDS UPON INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, on the subject of certain frauds and abuses practiced upon Indians who endeavor to avail themselves of the homestead laws in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. ROBERTSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Mississippi Levees, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4318) to provide for the organization of the Mississippi River improvement commission, and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel and the improvement of the navigation of the said Mississippi River and the protection of its alluvial lands, with an amendment appropriating $3,871,574 for closing crevasses and raising and strengthening the levees on the Mississippi River; and moved that the bill and amendment be recommitted, and that the amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the report (and accompanying maps) of the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River, to accompany House bill No. 4318, with amendment, be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

JULIA A. NUTT.

Mr. KEIFER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4671) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompany report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES VALIER.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1210) for the relief of Charles Valier, late of Company M, Seventh Regiment Illinois Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN W. GALL.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John W. Gall, deceased, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES CLINE.

Mr. GARDNER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4326) granting a pension to Charles Cline, of Clinton County, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1612, a bill (H. R. No. 4672) to amend the statutes in relation to patents and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE AT OMAHA.

Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4673) limiting the rates for the transportation of freight and passengers over the bridge constructed by the Union Pacific Railroad Company across the Missouri River at Omaha, Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces that, pursuant to order, the session this evening will be for debate only, no business to be transacted. The gentleman from New York, Mr. COVERT, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The House accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) took a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock, Mr. COVERT occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the session this evening is for general debate only, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] is entitled to the floor.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs have reported the bill (H. R. No. 2865) to reorganize the Army of the United States, to consolidate certain of its staff departments, to reduce the cost of its support, and for other purposes. I will read the first section of that bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, on or before the 1st day of July, 1878, to reduce the number of enlisted men in the Army to twenty thousand; and thereafter there shall be no more than twenty thousand enlisted men in the Army at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law.

It is to that feature of the bill that I desire to address myself this evening.

Mr. Speaker, the motives which induced men to establish and organize governments were to secure to themselves the enjoyment of certain rights; for instance, the security of person and property, and protection against aggressions from any quarter whatsoever. A state must perpetuate its existence in order to effect the ends for which it was instituted, hence self-preservation is the first law of nations as well as of individuals; and this is the highest and holiest duty a government can perform. There is a contract between the state and its citizens—the terms are explicit; the state guarantees protection to the citizen, and the citizen discharges all the duties of allegiance to the state; it is the return he makes for protection. The duties are reciprocal, they exist together or not at all; where there is no sovereignty, no protection, there can be no allegiance. Protection is an individual right; it travels with the citizen wherever he goes; it is affected neither by time nor space; its vitality and energy should be felt upon the snows of Russia, the sands of Africa, and the broad plains of Asia. Wherever adventure calls, wherever commerce spreads her sails, wherever science invites, a citizen of the United States should be able to go and to realize the fact that the banner of his country floats proudly over his head and goes before him as a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night.

In the discharge of this paramount duty to its members the state brings into requisition all the machinery of internal sovereignty, laws, courts, &c. In her external relations she is controlled by international law and by the comity and the customs of nations. When all this machinery and all the remedies it affords shall have failed to protect its members in the exercise of their rights, then in obedience to the law of self-preservation a state is justified in resorting to force. The patriots and sages who formed the Constitution of our country conferred ample power upon Congress to provide for all emergencies.

In obedience to the requirements of the Constitution, Congress raised an army, considering it indispensable for the purposes of protection. It is the creature of law, the prop upon which the civil authorities and the people lean in the hour of trial and peril. It is too small to menace the liberties of the people, and I believe history justifies the assertion that no scheme has ever been set on foot by the Army, through its officers or men, to make an assault upon our free institutions. It has generally been in sympathy with the people; and, aided by the militia, it will be adequate to the defense of our homes and capable of repelling invasion, let it come whence it may and in strength however formidable.

With the Army as a nucleus to formulate, to drill, and to discipline our citizen soldiery, I am confident we can, when needful, organize a force as efficient and heroic as any the world has ever seen. They will face danger as bravely and coolly, sacrifice property, even life, as cheerfully, when duty and the good of the country demand it, as any people of any land or any age. The warlike spirit animating the bosoms of the people renders them soldiers almost by nature, yet any event calling them from their daily avocations to the tented field may and should be regarded as a national calamity.

It is the duty of Congress to maintain a regular army, respectable in numbers, thoroughly equipped and supplied with all the appliances necessary to active and vigorous warfare, to the end that invasion from abroad may be repelled, that certain protection be afforded to our widely-extended borders, that the rapacity and plundering disposition of the marauders and lawless spirits of conterminous states be repressed, our coast defenses kept in order, and the public property and military stores be preserved. No higher duty than this rests upon the legislative branch of the Government.

To meet these absolute and imperative requirements, is an army of twenty thousand men sufficient? In my judgment it is not.

The extent of the frontier and interior lines, which should be covered and protected constitute an important element in the consideration of this question. In the same connection the coast line and the fortifications deserve a prominent place, also the immense amount of public property upon those lines and elsewhere that should be guarded and kept in a state of preservation.

The line from the mouth of the Rio Grande, Texas, to San Diego, California, is sixteen hundred and ninety-two miles in length. On it and contiguous to it there are seventeen military posts. A large proportion of the territory adjacent to this line is open to the incursions of raiders from Mexico and to forays from Indians.

From San Diego, California, to Cape Flattery, Washington Territory, the distance is fifteen hundred and five miles. There is an interior line corresponding in length which is the theater of Indian troubles, and not long since was involved in a war with a small number of Modocs, which cost the United States the loss of many valuable lives and the outlay of a million or two of treasure.

From Cape Flattery, Washington Territory, to Passamaquoddy Bay, near the New Brunswick boundary line, is a distance of thirty-one hundred and seventy-five miles.

Upon this line and contiguous to it there are twenty-five or thirty posts or forts. The adjacent territory is the home of many savage and warlike Indians. The late wars with Sitting Bull, Chief Joseph and others, the Custer defeat, the rigorous winter campaigns, the long and wasting forced marches, the murder of citizens, the desolation of homes—show what its tragic history has been and what it may be in the future.

In addition to those already mentioned, there are long interior lines:

The line of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad, say from Omaha to San Francisco, is about nineteen hundred miles in length, and has in the vicinity of its route twenty-five posts.

The line from Fort Bayard, New Mexico, to Fort Duncan, Texas, by way of Fort Garland, Colorado; Fort Hays, Kansas; and Camp Supply, Indian Territory, has a length of two thousand and twenty-six miles.

The line from Fort Wallace, Kansas, to Fort Buford, Dakota, and back to Fort Hays, Kansas, is nineteen hundred and nine miles long.

According to these data we have exterior and interior lines 12,207 miles in length, which are exposed to aggressive incursions from Indians for three-fourths of their entire extent. We have interior lines, not included in this estimate, aggregating more than five thousand miles in length. We have within these several lines about one hundred and seventy military posts and about eighty Indian agencies. The coast line from the mouth of the Rio Grande to the New Brunswick boundary line, by way of the forts, is thirty-three hundred and seventy-five miles long. All the lines spoken of should be guarded. The aggregate length of all the lines indicated above is a little less than twenty-one thousand miles.

Another item of moment in the consideration of this question is the public buildings and the immense quantity of stores belonging to the Quartermaster's, the Ordnance, and other departments. The Quartermaster's Department is responsible for property and stores to the amount of $79,414,844. The arsenals and ordnance and ordnance stores in them are valued at $45,500,000. The fortifications up to January, 1874, cost $54,686,837. The cannon to arm them and to arm batteries for harbor and river defense cost $20,000,000. Total, $199,601,681. These estimates have been derived from official sources, and are in the main correct.

It is estimated that additions to fortifications and harbor and river defenses since 1874, and property at Indian agencies and on Indian reservations, and surgical instruments and supplies of medicines on hand in the medical department, and stores on hand in the subsistence department, are worth $5,000,000. This makes a grand total of the property in charge of Army officers, and guarded and protected by the Army, of $204,601,681.

In proximity to the frontier and interior lines there are more than two hundred and seventy-eight thousand Indians. Many of the different tribes are hereditary foes to the white race.

We have a long line bordering upon Mexico, and it is an admitted fact that our relations with the people of that government are unsatisfactory and liable to become more so at any moment. Mexico has a population of more than nine million and a regular army of 22,387 men. Her revolutionary masses are unfriendly to the people of the United States. There is no country on earth where the lives of Americans are less valued, their property less secure, and their rights less respected than in the land whose sons have been making war upon their own government almost continuously for fifty years, who decide their election by the bayonet, who are instinctively afraid to trust in the good faith of each other, and who have never observed a treaty unless its infraction involved great hazard.

It is not too much to say that the tardiness of our Government to punish Mexico for the many insults to our flag and outrages upon our people has been from considerations of humanity and generosity to an imbecile sister republic, out of regard to her domestic dissensions and the largest measure of charity and forbearance—a charity and forbearance shared in alike by both our Government and people and participated in even by those who have been the immediate sufferers. But, sir, the time is at hand when that forbearance should cease. Repeated wrongs and outrages, beginning in 1859 and recently reenacted; the memories of the butcheries at the Alamo, at Goliad, and the cowardly decimation and shooting down in cold blood of handcuffed prisoners of war will revive a conflict that will bring fearful retribution and the dismemberment of Mexican territory. The interests of our country demand that this conflict should not come. To prevent it your Army should be large enough to command respect and speedily to punish a violation of our soil.

These facts, and others I propose to mention, prove conclusively to my mind that we need a regular Army of at least twenty-five thousand men; that the public welfare imperiously demands such a force; that, in order to defend the frontier, to protect the public property, to occupy forts and posts, to keep the Indians quiet on the reservations, that Army must be distributed prudently and wisely, handled skillfully, and kept in a state of constant activity.

When our Government was organized a regular Army was raised, and among the great duties intrusted to it was that of defending the frontier. That Army has been the agent of settlement and of progress. Around its posts and its camps pioneers have clustered, communities have sprung into existence, order has been established, law has been introduced, and grand States, one after another, have been added to the Union.

These things have been brought about because wherever the national banner has been unfurled a feeling of confidence has been inspired and a sense of security created, and that spot has been forever consecrated to liberty. In practice we seem to have adopted the maxim of the Roman people: "Wherever the Roman citizen conquers he inhabits." It ought to be the pride of every citizen of the United States to truthfully say: "Wherever the American flag floats over American soil there is security to person and property; there society exists; there order prevails, and law reigns supreme."

I have already shown that the Army occupies and covers lines almost twenty-one thousand miles in length. Now, supposing the Army full to its maximum strength of twenty-five thousand men, the average per mile would be a little less than one soldier and one-fourth to every mile of line occupied and required to be protected. Then there must be deducted from the aggregate strength of the Army the officers and privates on duty in the Signal Corps, the Engineer Department, ordnance sergeants, hospital stewards, commissary sergeants, prison guard at Fort Leavenworth, West Point detachment, servicemen at the War Department and various headquarters, amounting in all to twenty-five hundred and fifty-three, leaving 22,447 officers and men to occupy the forts and the posts and to defend the frontier.

I am satisfied that the great loss of life, destruction of property, insults to our flag, and violation of our soil heretofore referred to resulted from the fact that the troops on the frontier lines were insufficient in numbers to guard and protect them. The ease with which an adroit and subtle foe could pass between posts and penetrate the settlements was an inducement to do so. A small army stretched out upon long lines invites attack. The Army has been required to do so much, to cover such a broad extent of territory, that it could not adequately perform the duty required of it.

In military matters efficiency is the only measure of economy. As a general rule where the means are insufficient to accomplish the ends there is loss and waste. An appropriation too small to effect the object for which it is made is usually the worst kind of prodigality, an unjustifiable squandering of public money. The continuing in service of a few more men and the appropriation of a little more money would have saved much loss of life and property. The difference in the cost cannot well be calculated. The lives of citizens cannot be estimated by the sordid measure of dollars and cents.

It may not be improper to make some observations on the strength of the regular Army at different periods since the organization of the Federal Government. In 1794 the regular Army numbered 3,629 men. The census of 1790 shows a population of 3,929,214. Allowing an increase of 1,000,000 for four years the aggregate population in 1794 amounted to 4,929,214. This divided by 3,629 shows an average of 1 soldier to every 1,355 souls. The Army in 1807 numbered 3,356. The population in 1810 was 7,239,881, an average of 2,153 inhabitants to 1 soldier. In 1808 the prospect of a rupture with Great Britain caused an increase of the Army. In 1817 the Army was 8,221 strong. It was increased soon after. The population in 1820 was 9,633,822, an average of 1 soldier to every 1,172 people. A financial pressure caused the adoption of a rigid system of economy, one truly deplorable as far as the frontier was concerned, as we shall see, and in 1820 the Army was cut down from 12,664, 1 to every 783 people, to 6,391 men, an average of 1 soldier to every 1,507 people.

Time does not permit me to follow the subject further than to mention the averages in 1860 and at present.

The population in 1860 aggregated 31,443,321, the Army 12,931, an average of 1 soldier to every 2,432 people. At present we have at least 40,000,000 of people and an army of 25,000 men. The average is 1 soldier to every 1,600 souls.

A great deal has been said about the danger of a standing army—that it imperils the liberties of the people—and the sages and the heroes of the Revolution are cited as authority; yet the regular Army during the administration of Washington was larger in proportion to the population than it is now.

Before closing my remarks on this branch of the subject I will observe that Mr. Calhoun, in his letter of December 11, 1818, said:

> Were our military establishment reduced one-half, it is obvious that if the same posts continued to be occupied which now are, the same number of officers in the Quartermaster's, Commissary's, Paymaster's, Medical, and Adjutant and Inspector-General's Departments would be required.

This allegation is applicable to the situation now. If the Army should be reduced and the number of posts be lessened, then the Indians would attack the exposed settlements, as they have done heretofore. Should the same posts continue to be occupied, the garrisons would be insignificant and weak, and the Indians would attack them, as they have often done.

A carefully prepared table of the number of officers in proportion to the number of enlisted men, from 1850 to 1878, shows the average has been very nearly the same as now. In 1850 it stood thus: proportion of total commissioned officers to men, 1 to $10\frac{23}{24}$; proportion of line officers to men, 1 to $16\frac{1}{25}$. The ratio varied a little at different periods: proportion of total commissioned officers to men, 1 to $11\frac{13}{17}$; proportion of line officers to men, 1 to $15\frac{13}{24}$; this is the ratio now.

The number of posts occupied necessarily increases the number of staff-officers. The length of a line increases the expense of maintaining the same number of troops on a shorter line.

The difference in the expense of troops in garrison and on an active campaign is at least 40 per cent.; others say it is more. This is caused by the wear and tear of vehicles, the loss of public animals, and injuries to the same, the additional cost accruing from the employment of citizen wagons, and hiring teams, the cost of supplies purchased at prices in excess of the contract cost, and many other reasons I have not time to mention.

The pay of officers has engaged much attention. It is a question of great importance. It is essential that the leaders of our regular and citizen soldiery should be qualified to discharge their respective trusts; they are charged with the care of the lives of their respective commands; and the armies of the United States have in their keeping the life and the honor of the nation. These are grave responsibilities. It is the duty of Congress to enact such laws as will secure the services of able and efficient officers. Mr. Calhoun handled this subject with his usual rare ability. In speaking of the necessary skill and acquirements attainable at the Military Academy, he continued:

> For this purpose respectability of rank and compensation must be given to the officers of the Army in due proportion to the other pursuits of life.

Again he observed:

> The profession of arms, in the well-established state of things which exists among us, has no reward but what is attached to it by law; and if that should be inferior to other professions it would be idle to suppose individuals possessed of the necessary talents and character would be induced to enter it.

These extracts require no comment. Our military system has been formed upon the suggestion and experience of talented and efficient men as well as upon the views of eminent statesmen. Our Army organization has been the result of much profound thought and labor. It has received the sanction of distinguished generals. It has been tried and found equal to every emergency. It has stood the test of war. It is suited to the genius of our people and to the character of the territory upon which it is carried into practical operation. The honored heroes and patriots who have passed away did not gainsay it. What the brightest military geniuses of America, both living and dead, have aided to establish, I shall not vote to pull down. I am ready to assist in carrying out any reform suggested by men of great military talent and experience. Untrained genius may astonish us by its brilliant theories, but to be led by its vivid and erratic light is like quitting a broad and firm road to follow an ignis fatuus through bogs and fens.

The bill presents a question of economy, and I propose to discuss it with that question in view, because its solution involves a saving of public money on the one hand and on the other the imperiling of the peace of the country and the jeopardizing of the lives of the people and their property. In my judgment the provisions of this bill do not accord with an economical administration of the Government. That legislation which saves for the present a few dollars, but which, when trouble comes, causes the expenditure of millions that might have been saved by a timely and adequate appropriation for a sufficient force to defend the frontier, is merely reprehensible extravagance. The reduction of the Army has been the theme of professed reformers for half a century, and they have seldom looked beyond immediate results. In 1818, while Mr. Calhoun was Secretary of War, he wrote a communication on the subject, in reply to a resolution of the House, in which he argued that the Army as then organized was not larger than the public welfare demanded. He deprecated the idea that our Army, so small in comparison to the number of the people, distributed at so many posts, situated so far apart, could be considered "dangerous to our liberty," and he ridiculed it as partaking "more of timidity than wisdom."

In 1820 he wrote a similar letter, and said:

> I am aware that the militia is considered, and in many respects justly, as the great national force; but to render them effective every experienced officer must acknowledge that they require the aid of regular troops.
> Supported by a suitable corps of trained artillerists and by a small but well-disciplined body of infantry they may safely be relied on to garrison our forts and to act in the field as light troops. In these services their zeal, courage, and habit of using fire-arms would be of great importance and would have their full effect. To rely on them beyond this, to suppose our militia capable of meeting in the open field the regular troops of Europe, would be to resist the most obvious truth and the whole of our experience as a nation. War is an art to attain perfection in which much time and experience, particularly for officers, are necessary.

In order to avoid defeats and their consequent sacrifices in the beginning of wars that great statesman recommended such an organization of the Army that—

> There should be nothing either to new-model or to create. The only difference, consequently, between the peace and the war formation of the Army ought to be in the increased magnitude of the latter, and the only change in passing from the former to the latter should consist in giving to it the augmentation which will then be necessary.

He contended that the Army should be increased to meet the expansion of the frontier and to serve as a nucleus upon which to drill and discipline the militia in time of war. To meet the latter important requirement he deemed it essential that the Army should be augmented in a proper ratio with the increase of population. His suggestions were overborne by the fierce demand for immediate relief and the adoption of measures of retrenchment. The results were stated by General Cass, Secretary of War, in a letter in answer to a resolution of the Senate, dated March 8, 1836. He insisted that the Army was insufficient "to garrison the fortifications of the seaboard, and at the same time to give protection to the inhabitants residing in the States and Territories bordering on the Indian frontier." He said:

> With respect to the inland frontier, circumstances of a still more imperative character require an augmentation of the Army. Events have shown that our force in that quarter is not sufficient to keep the Indians in check. Disturbances are continually occurring at comparatively short intervals, some of which terminate merely by alarming and agitating the country, while others lead to hostilities more or less extensive. On these occasions the regular troops are collected from great distances and a militia force is usually called out. Heavy expenses are the necessary consequences, besides the loss of property and the derangement of business in the section where the troubles exist. Instead of having a force at all times embodied sufficient to overawe the Indians, or if they commence hostilities to immediately subdue them, much time is lost in the necessary arrangements, while the spirit of disaffection is spreading and the hostile force becomes thus greatly increased.

He says further:

> Within the last nine years we have had four difficulties of this nature, one with the Winnebagoes, two with the Sacs and Foxes, and one with the Florida Indians, which, altogether, have occasioned great loss of property, great derangement of business, a heavy expenditure of money, and much inconvenience in those portions of country affected by these troubles and which furnished the militia whose services were required to aid the regular troops in their operations. An augmentation of the Army to a reasonable extent, if it did not prevent these occurrences altogether, would certainly render them less frequent as well as less injurious and extensive. And this policy is not less humane than useful. It is far better by the display of force to render its employment unnecessary than it is to be compelled to resort to it with the usual accompaniments of an Indian campaign.

These remarks as to the necessity of having an adequate force in the field, and the humanity and economy of preventing border troubles, are as forcibly applicable to the present as they were to the past. To illustrate the truth of this assertion I will refer to some prominent Indian wars and border difficulties that have brought ruin, desolation, and mourning to many of the fairest portions of our frontier settlements.

The Black Hawk war commenced May 2, and ended August 14, 1832. It originated from the return to Illinois, on two occasions, of Black Hawk and his band, after they had left in accordance with treaty stipulations. The second visit of this noted chieftain was considered an invasion by Governor Reynolds, and he called into service 2,275 militia. These volunteers were soon disbanded, and replaced by 2,000 others. There were several small affairs with various results. The final rencounter was at Bad Ax, where Black Hawk was defeated and made prisoner. Our loss in this trouble was about 70 killed and 40 wounded, and about 320 died of disease. In round numbers it may be said this short campaign cost us 400 lives and about one million and a quarter of dollars. In Brown's History of Illinois the cost is put down at $2,000,000. Had there been a sufficient force of regular troops in that region to enforce the treaty with the Indians this loss of life and expenditure of money, as well as interruption to the peaceful pursuits of the people, would have been avoided.

The Seminole war commenced December 28, 1835, and continued seven years. At the time Osceola refused to leave Florida, and when he planned and executed the murder of the Indian agent, General Thompson, and others, in sight of Fort King, and the massacre of Major Dade's command, there were not four hundred effective regular troops in Florida.

The Government placed a heavy force of regulars and volunteers in the field. The losses in battle were considerable, and from disease very great. That of the regulars was accurately ascertained and officially stated as follows:

Of the medical staff, 10; lieutenant-colonels, 3; majors, 4; captains, 20; lieutenants, 37; sergeants, 84; corporals, 57; musicians, privates, and artificers, 1,251—total, 1,466.

Volunteers were called into the service from the States of Florida, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Tennessee, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania; also from the District of Columbia. The services of Delaware, Shawnee, Choctaw, and Creek Indians were accepted. According to Sprague's History of the Florida War the number of volunteers mustered in from 1835 to 1840 aggregated 20,026. This estimate of Sprague lacks three years of covering the entire period of the war. General Vincent, assistant adjutant-general, in a communication to General BANNING, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, dated Washington, February 3, 1876, says "the Black Hawk and Florida wars necessitated fifty-five thousand militia." The Black Hawk war required more than four thousand volunteers, the Florida about fifty thousand.

I have not been able to secure a list of the deaths among the volunteers. I think it was as great as that of the regulars, seamen, and marines. I estimate the number of non-combatants—men, women, and children—killed, at five hundred.

In assuming that the Florida war cost us the immense sacrifice of 3,466 lives I shall do no violence to truth.

These Florida campaigns cost the United States $29,233,823.71; a few dollars more perhaps.

This fact can be ascertained by consulting the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1877, page 14.

Smith in his History of Florida estimates the loss of property in that State resulting from the war at $5,000,000. A report from a committee of the Senate, third session Twenty-fifth Congress, vol. 3, p. 195, states that the claims for Indian depredations arising from the Florida war from Alabama, Georgia, &c., amounted to $1,259,407.30. These two amounts added to the one above given make the sum of $35,493,231.01 as the immediate cost of the Florida war. An examination of the pension-rolls and land bounties would show an additional amount the people have had to pay for the want of a few more regular troops in Florida at the time of the outbreak by the Indians.

March 22, 1838, the Secretary of War reported to Congress upon the comparative expense of volunteers, militia, and regulars, which report shows for a company of fifty regulars, dragoons, for six months, a cost of $13,573.34; regular infantry for same time, $4,662.06; mounted volunteers for same period, $22,575.01; volunteer infantry, $7,286.69. This table is continued further, but the same proportion holds all the way through.

In making this report General Towson commented as follows:

This enormous disparity in the expense of the two forces is not owing to the extravagant allowances made to volunteers; for, except in the article of clothing, they are not better paid than regular troops, and altogether insufficiently compensated to reimburse them for the pecuniary sacrifices they make in leaving home and employment, to say nothing of the danger and hardships they encounter. It is caused principally by expenses for traveling to and from the place where the services of volunteers and militia are required; to the hire, maintenance, and indemnity for horses; to purchasing them a full supply of clothing as a bounty, without regard to length of service. The statements also show the expenses of volunteers serving on post and of militia. The term of service of the latter never exceeds three months unless especially provided for. There is one comparison that would place the contrast between the expenses of regular and irregular troops in a much stronger light, if I had the data to enable me to state it in figures, and that is the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces. The immense importance attached to this subject by European governments as a principal means of sustaining war has led to the most rigid economy and the strictest accountability in everything connected with the material of an army.

We have profited by their experience, and it is probable a more perfect system of accountability is nowhere to be found than in our little Army; but it requires the study of years to understand and the exercise of martial law to enforce it. This cannot be expected of irregular troops that serve at most but a few months. There is another subject which I would respectfully suggest should be considered in connection with the employment of volunteers, and that is the great inconvenience to which it subjects the useful class of citizens, the heavy tax imposed on their patriotism, and the loss the country sustains by diverting labor from its proper object and turning producers into consumers.—Sprague, pages 102, 103.

For more than forty years the Indians have been waging war upon Texas. Since annexation to the United States they profess to believe that Texans constitute a distinct tribe. Immediately after the consummation of that measure, and the consequent increase of frontier and of posts, the President was compelled to place volunteers in the field to aid in repelling Indian incursions. At various times since 1851 the different governors of the State have also been compelled to call volunteers into the State service.

At the present time Texas has a small battalion in the field. For these expenditures incurred by Texas a claim has been justly made against the General Government. I will say that it is, in my judgment, at least $500,000 less than the real amount, not containing the items of expense incurred by raising and maintaining a regiment commanded by Colonel M. T. Johnson that was called into service by Governor Houston in 1860. The account as officially stated amounts to $1,536,487.62, of which $509,111.95 accrued from 1855 to 1861, and the remainder since October, 1865.

After the conclusion of the late civil war the Indians continued to depredate upon the Texas frontier until the campaigns of our State troops, Custer, McKenzie, and others, reduced them into a state of comparative quietude. This was accomplished by the most active and vigorous campaigns, in some of which the troops suffered greatly from the severity of the winters.

The executive of Texas, in an official report of date August 8, 1867, said, "the different county judges of the border counties" have been called on for information in regard to Indian depredations since May, 1865. He gave the following résumé:

One hundred and sixty-four persons killed, twenty-four wounded, forty-three captured, twenty-nine of whom have been reclaimed; and he remarks that "a meager report from some of the counties shows a loss of thirty-four hundred and ninety-five horses, 30,165 head of cattle, 2,430 head of sheep." The value of this property was estimated at $287,881.75.

In addition to the foregoing, by reference to an official report of the adjutant-general of Texas it will be found that up to 1876, the date of his report, a large increase was added to the list of killed, wounded, and captives, a corresponding increase in the amount of property stolen and destroyed, besides the plundering of the United States mail-coaches, the murder of seven teamsters in charge of Government stores, and the loss of the teams, wagons, and supplies. I will remark that Indian depredations are of monthly, almost weekly, occurrence in Texas even now.

The Cortina war was caused by the removal of the United States troops from the posts on the Lower Rio Grande in 1859 by order of General Twiggs with the acquiescence of the Secretary of War. Juan N. Cortina was under indictment for murder and other crimes on the American side of the Rio Grande. He received authority from a Mexican officer to enlist men for service in Mexico. He did so; but at the head of fifty or sixty followers he invaded United States territory and took possession of Brownsville, Cameron County, Texas, on the morning of September 28, 1859. He murdered citizens, broke open the jail, liberated the prisoners, and committed robberies. He waged war upon the flag and the people of the United States for more than seven months, and used Mexico as a place of deposit for his stolen property and finally as an asylum for himself and adherents.

Major Heintzelman, in his official report made in 1860, sums up results. He says:

The amount of claims for damages presented is $336,826.21; many of these are exaggerated, but then there are few Mexicans who put in any. * * *

There have been fifteen Americans and eighty friendly Mexicans killed. Cortina has had one hundred and fifty-one men killed; of the wounded, I have no record.

Cortina became a noted character in Mexico. He was made an officer in the regular army and promoted to the rank of brigadier-general.

He had taught his countrymen how easy it was to raid upon the hated "Gringos" and to escape with wealth gained by force and fraud. He had numerous imitators eager for an opportunity to carry fire and sword upon Americans. It eventually came.

After the close of our civil war citizens of Mexico began to fit out expeditions to invade the Territory of the United States and to plunder her people. Mexican officers at the head of their commands crossed the Rio Grande and committed acts of hostility. Our citizens were murdered, maltreated, and robbed.

A reign of terror existed between the Nueces River and the Lower Rio Grande. There was no security for person or property outside the towns and beyond the range of the guns of the regular troops. Custom-houses were robbed; inspectors of customs killed; ranches deserted; houses abandoned; stores and post-offices robbed. Men were tortured, shot, stabbed, and burned alive. Ladies were made prisoners, and in some instances violated. Children captured by Mexicans and their Indian allies were enslaved. In short, there was no outrage which hatred, cupidity, and revenge could devise which was not inflicted upon an unoffending people. These excesses continue to be committed.

It is impossible to say how many were the victims of this infernal border warfare; a record was not kept. They fell unseen in the prairie and the chaparral. I estimate the killed since 1865 at three hundred, though I am sure it is less than the real number. The United States frontier commission had many claims filed before it for damages. Many of the claims for losses of stock called for consequential damages. The greater portion of these have been remodeled and the original losses only retained. The work has not been completed. A few days ago the report was as follows: the losses of stock, $12,495,534; for miscellaneous claims, including damages for personal injuries, property taken, &c., $1,930,769.25; making a total of $14,426,303.25.

This sacrifice of life and of property, these deeds of cruelty and barbarism, these sufferings and agonizing tortures, were heaped upon a defenseless people because the weakness of our Army necessitated an evacuation of the posts on the Lower Rio Grande for the purpose of using the forces elsewhere.

During the year 1862 the frontier of Minnesota was nearly stripped of troops; a few posts were inadequately garrisoned. The Sioux and their allies took advantage of this, and, in August of that year, they made an attack on many defenseless settlements. They attempted to capture posts and towns and committed many murders and outrages. In his report of November, 1862, the Secretary of the Interior estimated that the immediate result of the outbreak was the loss of eight hundred lives. This border war lasted about two years. General Pope assumed command and had six thousand men in the field. Families were massacred from time to time; battles were fought. General Sibley encountered a force of twenty-two hundred warriors. General Sully engaged a heavy force of Indians.

Nineteen counties of Minnesota were broken up and completely abandoned, ten partially so. February 16, 1863, Congress enacted a law on the subject; also, May 28, 1864. A commission was created to take testimony and make awards for losses of property. The awards amounted to $1,370,374. (Executive Document, first session Thirty-seventh Congress, volume 9, House Library.)

The State of Minnesota was reimbursed $350,000 for supplies she paid for. Friendly Sioux were paid $7,500. Estimated cost of volunteers on temporary duty, $100,000. The extra cost of whole campaign, six thousand men, for nearly two years, $6,000,000. Aggregate cost of the war, $7,827,874. Senator Rice, in 1863, assumed that the loss of life was stated by some at two thousand. I shall adopt that as covering the massacred, killed in battle, those who died of wounds, of hunger and exposure, and of disease.

These losses and sufferings and the bad effects arising from a recession of the frontier might have been avoided by distributing five hundred troops on the borders of Minnesota.

An Indian war existed on our northwestern frontier for many years. It assumed a formidable importance in 1868 and required the services of a large number of troops to bring it to a conclusion. The events which inspired the Indians with confidence and hope, and to renew the war with increased energy, will be briefly stated.

At the solicitation of the peace commission the line of the Powder River road was abandoned. March 2, 1868, orders were given for breaking up Forts Phil. Kearney, Reno, and C. F. Smith. The Indians attributed this action to fear. August 10, 1868, two or three hundred Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Sioux attacked the settlers on the Saline, north of Fort Harker. General Sheridan said in a report:

> The Indians, commencing about the 10th of August, had distributed themselves along the western line of settlements in Kansas, and the western line of settlements in Colorado, and the lines of travel up Smoky Hill River to Denver, and on the Arkansas River, and the Santa Fé roads, driving in the settlers, stopping all commercial traffic, murdering many defenseless persons in the most brutal manner.

Governor Crawford, of Kansas, telegraphed that a train had been "attacked, captured, and burned" at Pawnee Fork; that the Indians "killed, scalped, and burned sixteen men." The number of Kiowas and Comanches engaged in this war was estimated at six thousand. Many battles were fought, many privations endured, many soldiers and citizens were killed, and much property lost and destroyed in this war, which ended in 1875. These losses were caused by the evacuation of the line and of forts. They teach a lesson which should not be forgotten.

We are called upon to reduce the Army and to repeat the fearful experiences of the past.

The Modoc war, the Sitting Bull campaigns, and the late Nez Percé war have harassed the frontier and excited the public mind. They have affected the different sections in which they ensued most injuriously by creating a sense of insecurity and preventing immigration.

In these wars on the western and northern frontier, from the most accurate official data I can obtain, from 1866 to 1877, there were 658 officers and soldiers killed and wounded by Indians. The killed average about 2 to 1 more than the wounded. There are official accounts of the killing of 135 citizens and the wounding of 9. In 1876 our loss was 288 regulars killed, 128 wounded.

The extra cost of these wars has been great; that of 1876 alone has been estimated at $2,000,000. From 1866 to 1877 I estimate the total extra cost at $5,000,000; and I think an accurate calculation would increase the sum.

The facts of history justify me in saying that all these wars and their terrible results might have been prevented had the regular Army been sufficiently large to have overawed the Indians or to have defeated them without waiting for re-enforcements. One hundred men more would have enabled General Gibbon to have crushed out the Nez Percé war before much mischief had been done.

In 1867 the governor of Montana was authorized by General Sherman to organize eight hundred volunteers to drive the Indians out of Gallatin Valley. These troops served several months, and a claim was made against the General Government for pay for their services amounting to $980,313.11. Congress legislated on the subject, the claims were investigated, and General Hardie recommended the payment of $456,504.21.

In answer to a communication asking for the information the Secretary of the Interior, on the 21st of March last, states the amount of claims by reason of depredations committed by the Indians on the whites, filed in his Department since April, 1864, at $5,998,620.41, and the amount of claims on account of depredations committed by whites upon the property of Indians at $625,000.

The result of these Indian wars and border troubles in loss of life, destruction of property, and expenditure of public money is truly frightful. It shows a loss of life of seventy-one hundred and ninety-six persons, and expenditure of public money, loss of property, &c., amounting to $72,221,443.59. It cannot be pretended that this estimate comes up to the real facts.

Such is the economy a reduction of the Army inculcates. Under the alluring plea of retrenchment it may be whitened without, but within like a hideous sepulcher will be found the bones of the dead, slaughtered in its name.

I beg to call the attention of the House to the present condition of affairs on the northwestern border of Texas and territory of other States adjacent thereto. I gather from the official reports of Army officers high in rank that late in 1877 more than twelve thousand Indians were crowded together at Fort Sill and Fort Reno. December 4, 1877, General Pope reports that these Indians are in a state of "semi-starvation." He says, in substance, they are savages recently subdued, and held quiet by fear—restless, dissatisfied, and endeavoring to return to their old haunts on the Staked Plains. He represents that eight hundred Pawnees and one thousand Cheyennes are in the neighborhood of these forts, hunting for a living where there is little or no game. He predicts an outbreak, and says that the fault will not be with the famishing Indians.

General McKenzie has in two reports called attention to the necessity of increasing the garrison of Fort Sill. The latter is dated December 17, 1877. He says that the Cheyenne agency and Fort Elliott are not sufficiently garrisoned. General Sheridan indorses the recommendations of General McKenzie, and remarks:

> I coincide with Colonel McKenzie's suggestions and judgment as to the number of troops which should be held in the Indian Territory; but the force in this division and in the Army is so inadequate to properly meet the wants of the public service as to preclude even the possibility of complying.

There are other Indians in proximity to those surrounding Fort Sill and Fort Reno. In all they amount to fifteen or eighteen thousand. We have upon the borders of Texas and Kansas this formidable body of Kiowa, Comanche, Cheyenne, Apache, Sioux, and other Indians, lately hostile and now sullen and discontented. They can place in the field from twenty-five hundred to three thousand warriors. According to official reports of date January 18, 1878, the garrisons at Fort Sill and Fort Reno amounted to only five hundred and eighty-three officers and men.

Is it probable, or possible, that this handful of regular troops will be able to restrain the large number of restless and discontented Indians, smarting under recent defeat, that surround them? Very late and trustworthy information received from the border of Texas is to the effect that the Kiowas and Comanches in large numbers are distant from their reservations on the Staked Plains in Texas menacing the frontier.

To add to the dangers impending over the northwestern border of my State, Fort Richardson and Fort Griffin are virtually abandoned. According to the "roster of troops serving in the Department of Texas," published by General Ord, for the month of March, 1878, these posts are temporarily garrisoned by Company E, Tenth Infantry, that is, a half company is at each post taking care of the public property, and even that handful of men may soon be withdrawn.

A gap of about three hundred miles of frontier, between Fort Sill, Indian Territory, and Fort Concho, Texas, is left uncovered and exposed to the hostile inroads of half-starved and discontented Indians, and they are thoroughly apprised of its unprotected condition. What is still more discouraging is the already quoted declaration of General Sheridan, that he has not sufficient troops in his military division to strengthen posts now occupied, and the Army is not adequately large to furnish them. The sanguinary scenes of the past indicate too truly what tragic events we shall have in the future. Yet gentleman clamor for a reduction of the Army, and expect the Representatives of Texas to support their scheme of so-called economy, to sacrifice life and property, and to silence the voice of complaint by blandly terming it retrenchment.

Information of a late date verifies this foreboding. Raids have been made upon the western border of Texas and upon the Rio Grande within a few days past. Mail carriers have been killed, and a goodly number of citizens also. Two small boys of Mr. W. H. Steele have been captured and carried into Mexico. These statements are based on telegrams, many of them from official sources.

In my judgment, the Army is now too weak to afford that sure and adequate protection to which our people are entitled. Reduce it as proposed, and necessarily you must discontinue some of the military posts, thus lengthening exposed lines, inviting attack, and forcing back settlements already begun. It is a legislative invitation on the part of the American Congress to Mexican banditti to renew their thieving and murdering incursions, and an incentive to the wily savage to enact over again the scenes of barbarity, inhuman outrage, and atrocity so long and so often practiced by him.

This saving to the Government by a reduction of the Army is a premium offered by American statesmanship to blood-thirsty savages, to thieving Mexicans, to lawless American citizens, to pillage the border settlements, to burn frontier towns, to carry women and children into a captivity worse than death; in fact, an inducement held out by the statesmanship of the period to the enemies of peace, good order, and the advancement of our borders, to attack, murder, burn, and plunder the hapless settlers who have had just reason to believe that the strong arm of the Government would be ever ready to give them protection.

In the name of the many thousands of our people who are delving in the mines of Colorado and Nevada, in Arizona, Utah, and other Territories, who are exploring the tops and gulches of the Rocky Mountains and the Black Hills; and of those who are turning up the virgin soil and making productive the valleys and plains of Dakota, Washington, Oregon, and Montana, and other fertile sections of the country; the adventurous and daring men who have been allured from peaceful homes by promises of protection by the Government, to undergo hardships and privations in order that the resources of our great country may be developed; and in the name of the people of Texas—especially that portion of them scattered from the Canadians along eight hundred miles of frontier to the Rio Grande, and along a still greater distance from the mouth of the latter stream to El Paso, I enter my solemn protest against this reduction of the Army. In the name of humanity, I protest against it! Under the false plea of economy it weighs money against the blood of the fathers, husbands, mothers, wives, daughters, and little children, of the pioneers of the country, who have been induced by their faith in the Government to become the advance-guard of our progress, development, and civilization.

Keep on reducing your Army as your frontier borders are extended, and you shift the defense from the regular troops, where the Constitution places it, and you impose it upon the people. You call them from peaceful pursuits to defend their lives and their homes; you cause the settlements to recede; you check immigration and the consequent increase of productive and taxable values; you stay the onward march of development and progress, and keep the older and more densely populated sections choked with an idle, consuming, and unproductive population that languishes and suffers for the want of cheap homes and profitable employment; you legislate ruin, want, and crime where you should save, shield, encourage, and protect; and you expect to sustain yourselves by telling the already oppressed millions of the country that this is retrenchment and reform. Yes, retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government while millions of the hard earnings of the people of the border and interior frontier lines, covering thousands of miles of territory, are swept away by rapine and violence! Economy, when a few paltry thousands are saved to the Federal Treasury by a reduction of the Army, at a time when your flag is insulted, your soil invaded, your citizens murdered, and their property destroyed by an insolent foreign foe! Yes, reform! What kind of reform?

Is it the reformation of bad government to good government? Do the democratic members of this House delude themselves into the belief that the people are so desirous of reform as to induce their acquiescence in a measure which perpetuates bad government by continuing a system which has caused our soil to be desecrated by the footsteps of foreign invaders and polluted by deeds of violence and blood, by making that nefarious system more intolerable by a further reduction of our insufficient Army? Do they imagine that their constituents will accept as a measure of retrenchment in the right direction this bill which will cause an increased want of respect for their Government and a further loss of prestige? Do they dream that the American people will submit much longer to be maltreated and sneered at by the insolent officials of Mexico, because their Representatives tell them it is done in the cause of reform?

For one I do not believe the American character has become so degenerate as to tolerate such a reform. In time past the doctrine has been "millions for defense, not a cent for tribute." But now it seems that a premium is to be offered for the violation of our soil, the murder of our people, and the destruction of their property.

Mr. Speaker, I am as much in favor of economy, retrenchment, and reform as any man on this floor, when such measures can be adopted with propriety and for the promotion of the public good, but when it is proposed to reduce the Army under existing circumstances I cannot support the proposition. To do so would, in my opinion, be an abandonment of the frontier to the Indians and handing over the border settlements to butchery.

May I not appeal to the Representatives of the States bordering on the Atlantic, the Northern Lakes, and the Gulf of Mexico, in the name of an exposed frontier, whose people have suffered much and long, not to abandon them while danger darkly hovers over them? You have been provided for. It has been officially stated that up to January, 1874, there have been expended on forts and batteries $54,686,837, and the cannon and stores to arm and supply these works cost an additional $20,000,000. Of all these defensive works there is scarcely one on the Indian and Mexican frontier, and not a single one within the State of Texas—not even a single United States musket on the coast from the mouth of the Sabine to the mouth of the Rio Grande.

Can I not in the name of justice and of humanity implore you to economize where life is not imperiled, to drop a few millions from the appropriations annually made to extend and repair works for your harbor defenses, your torpedo stations, and for other matters intended to protect commerce and to promote commercial intercourse, and not to reduce the Army? If you are determined to lay bare the breasts of our pioneers to the strokes of their enemies, if you intend to prepare a feast of blood, pillage, and rapine for the savage and the Mexican marauder, pass this bill, reduce the Army, and when a few hundreds of men, women, and children have been massacred in cold blood you may stand up with Pharisaical composure and say to your constituents, "Thank God, I helped to save the people's money."

TARIFF AND INTERNAL TAXATION.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, I have not often obstructed the business of Congress by tiresome speeches upon abstract propositions or vague theories, but the questions now pending are of such grave moment that I deem it my duty to put before the House in a plain way certain facts and figures, which, however feebly stated, may be of use to those who wish to reach just conclusions upon the subjects under discussion.

The people of the South, and I speak more particularly for those whom I have the honor in part to represent, are deeply interested in all questions relating to the tariff. From necessity, they favor a tariff, not for protection, however, but for revenue only. They favor a tariff which, judiciously imposed, will yield sufficient revenue for all governmental purposes without creating a bounty in favor of one class or section to the cost or detriment of another.

Important, however, as are all questions pertaining to the general tariff, to the people of my section, more important to them still are those matters relating to the character and operations of the excise laws—that system of taxation imposed under the name of internal-revenue taxes. And to this last named system will I principally direct my remarks.

I will not undertake to discuss the whole subject, nor at this late day in a labored manner question the power of Congress to levy a tax upon such articles or productions as are raised only in certain localities. I will content myself rather with considering the subject in its practical bearing upon a great industry, with a view to its modification and improvement; and in doing this I desire to appeal to the matured judgment rather than to the passions and prejudices of members, all of whom should be anxious to legislate for the best interests of the country.

I take it for granted that there are no fair-minded members of this body who desire to levy excessive taxes upon the people of any section or to needlessly keep up existing impositions. Unfortunately there are those in the country, and I fear some here, who through apprehension that the revenues of the Government may be imprudently impaired by a modification of the revenue system refuse either to examine the question for themselves or to listen to argument upon it from others. All that we ask is a careful examination of the facts and figures bearing upon the internal system. If after such examination as justice demands judgment is not rendered in our favor, we will accept the result and submit still longer to the hard fortune against which we have so long struggled.

As onerous and oppressive as we consider the system of internal taxation, we do not ask its abrogation. We only seek now, its modification in such way as that the burden may be lightened without detriment to the revenues of the Government. Can this be done? I admit it is an important question.

I firmly believe, Mr. Speaker, after a careful examination of the whole subject, that the present rate of taxation may be largely reduced without the slightest damage to the revenue. Indeed I am convinced that a material reduction of the tax upon distilled spirits and tobacco so far from reducing would increase the receipts to the Government.

The present system of internal taxation had its inception in 1862, during the pendency of a civil war; a period which quickened into life not only the entire energies of a people struggling in the throes of a grand convulsion, but which exhausted in addition every ordinary resource available to the Government. Congress then, to meet the emergency—without inquiring too closely into its powers and prerogatives—passed laws imposing an excise tax upon almost everything possessed, produced, worn, or consumed by the people of the United States, but without any thought that those duties would be continued longer than the duration of the war or than the then emergencies required.

Since the close of the war various acts have been passed relieving subject after subject from taxation until there remain only four or five articles or productions from which an immense revenue is gathered.

The great burden of the tax now rests upon distilled spirits and tobacco, and I propose to show how enormous are the rates, and how needless as well as impolitic are the exactions upon these two products.

At an early day of the session I introduced into Congress a bill to reduce the tax upon spirits distilled from grain from the present rate of 90 cents to 50 cents per gallon, and that upon spirits distilled from fruits to 25 cents per gallon. I offered the bill because I thought it of interest to the Government as well as just measure of relief to the people, but the Committee of Ways and Means acting upon indications from the House have declined to report that or any other bill for reduction of the spirit tax.

With all respect for the committee and the House, I must say that in my judgment it was a grave mistake to refuse to lessen the tax. Whatever gentlemen may think of spirits, still its production is a great industry which has brought and is still bringing millions into the Treasury. The tax is far in excess of the value of the article taxed. Indeed the distiller does not get by one-half as much per gallon for his product as the Government taxes it.

In addition, the Revenue department throws around the manufacture of the article such difficult, annoying, and rigid restrictions that none but men of large means or fraudulent purposes can profitably engage in the business. The result therefore is, that by operation of the heavy tax and the annoying restrictions mentioned, the poor men of the South and West have been driven from the field of production, and almost the entire business thrown into the hands of those who make no scruple of defrauding the Government, or who enjoy a monopoly by operation of a law which, if just, would bear equally upon all classes, sections, and persons. Were it otherwise, thousands of bushels of grain and fruit which annually go to waste and decay in many sections of the country might be made a source of profit to the people and revenue to the Government. For proof of my assertions I need only refer to the several reports of the Commissioners of Internal Revenue.

Since 1862 the tax rate upon spirits has been changed six times—sometimes increased, sometimes diminished, this most notable fact always appearing: that whenever the tax was lessened the revenue increased; and whenever increased, the revenue fell away.

For example, when the tax was at its highest, prior to 1868, the annual average revenue was less than $19,000,000; in July, 1868, ths tax was reduced to 50 cents, and the Government at once collectee $45,000,000, and the next year $56,000,000, more by many milliond than were ever collected before in any one year, or under any other rate. In 1872 the tax was raised to 70 cents, and at once the revenue declined. And so in 1875, when there was an increase of tax to 90 cents. These things are matters of fact and of history, and the Revenue department has but one argument to present in opposition to them, and that the single instance, the one fact, that in 1877 the revenue from liquors under the ninety-cent tax amounted to $57,469,429.72. The answer to that exhibit is simple and effectual, and afforded by the revenue report. A large amount of the spirits from which this last tax was derived was produced in 1875 and 1876. A considerable amount of the tax was secured from persons who had withheld it, and a check was put to large frauds superinduced in part by the weight of the tax. But how now? The Commissioner says his revenues are decreasing. Let his next report tell the dismal story.

I have alluded, Mr. Speaker, to the liquor tax, not with the expectation that Congress would recede from its position, but in the hope that after proper consideration the next session may give the needed relief.

I come now to speak of the tobacco tax. On the 7th of November, 1877, I introduced into Congress a bill "To reduce the tax upon manufactured tobacco and to regulate the tax upon dealers in and producers of leaf-tobacco." That bill, as will be seen upon examination, proposed a reduction of the tax to 12 cents, and a drawback in favor of manufacturers and dealers for the difference between 12 and 24 cents in cases where tobacco should be on hand and stamped at the higher rate when the new law took effect. It further provided for the sale by farmers, without the payment of tax, of tobacco raised by them or upon their lands, or lands subject to their control to the extent and amount of $150. There was also a provision for the sale of tobacco by the officer of any court taken under execution, and by any fiduciary of tobacco coming to his hands, without the payment of specific or other taxes.

Of course the bill was not altogether as I would have had it, but it was drawn after consultation with many members upon this floor, and deferred in some respects to the wishes and interests of those whose support I desired. The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, but that committee has not seen proper to report it to the House, but has reported another measure which, although not altogether agreeable to me, I shall support as the best perhaps attainable. I endeavored, in the bill which I prepared, to guard reasonably well every interest pertaining to tobacco, for I represent not only the manufacturer but the producer of tobacco, and the productive interest of a large scope of country. Not often is the voice of the planter heard either in or around this House. That valuable class of men seldom trouble Congress with long petitions, and never with a greedy lobby clamoring for favored legislation. They generally remain at home quietly following their industrial pursuits, while the heads of corporations and ring-masters are fiercely contending for such legislation as will in many cases enable them to dominate the rights if not absorb the property of others. The demand for the reduction of the tobacco tax comes not now from the consumer nor yet so much from the manufacturer, but from the producer of that great staple. Whatever gentlemen may think, however they may console themselves with the fine-spun but fallacious theory that the consumer pays this tax, I maintain that the great burden falls with crushing weight upon the hard-handed sons of toil engaged in the culture of tobacco.

Not here would you find the representatives of the tobacco sections clamoring for reduction if the bitter experience of their constituencies did not compel them to appeal to Congress for relief. A fearful energy is being imparted to the demands of the producers of the tobacco-growing regions of the country, for they behold in the near future the ruin of their hopes and the wreck of their fortunes unless relief is soon extended by Federal legislation.

Tobacco has been grown in Virginia since 1615, and almost from that period to the present it has been one of the great staples of the State. From Virginia the growth gradually extended into other States, until we now find immense quantities of it raised in the Carolinas, in Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, Missouri, Connecticut, and of late, for reasons which I will mention, it is grown in small farms and patches in Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and some I believe in Michigan.

No matter how esteemed, whether as a noxious or innoxious growth, tobacco constitutes a great staple, a most important factor in the commercial world, and its culture and manufacture gives employment if not profit to thousands of laborers, workmen, and traders.

A product constituting so important an element in all industrial and trade relations should, it seems, be fostered in its culture and protected in its manufacture and sale. But so far from that, Congress in 1862 laid a heavy tax, not, as was supposed, upon production, but upon its consumption. That tax has been changed from time to time until its burdens have become simply enormous, and in its operations it affects not so much consumption as production.

In former years although the tax was considered severe, its crushing weight was not so fully realized by the producer; but of late, owing to financial depression and the general shrinkage of all values, the disastrous effects of this fearful imposition are sadly felt by all classes.

The principle upon which the tax is levied being wrong—for it is levied upon the production of but few of the States—a sense of justice, it seems to me, should long since have induced Congress to so modify it as to render it less oppressive to the comparatively small section which in reality sustains it.

But instead, the Forty-third Congress, in despite of the interests of trade, in despite of promises to the contrary, and long after the emergency which called the law into existence had ceased, and after the beneficial effects of a modification had become apparent to all who considered the subject, increased the tax from 20 to 24 cents.

As bad as such action was esteemed before, it presented itself after the increase in all its repulsive proportions and brought plainly to the comprehension of all fair minds the miserable effects of a policy as discriminating as it was unjust; a policy which imposed upon one State, less in wealth and population than many others, a greater burden of taxation than that borne by a whole tier of States rich, powerful, and prosperous. For proof I need only refer to the fact that for several years past the State of Virginia, desolated and ruined by the ravages of war, raped of her territory by a cruel wrong, and her people manacled by the measures of a so-called reconstruction, has paid annually more Federal taxes by almost double than the whole of the New England States. The last fiscal year New England paid $3,407,179.72; on the other hand, Virginia paid $7,931,526.59. Indeed, my own little city of Danville, the center of a collection district of a few counties, paid in 1875 the sum of $2,361,261.96, and yearly since from one and a half to two million dollars, and in fact one of my counties paid into the Federal Treasury more revenue by double than the three States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont. And yet there have been found Representatives on this floor who, with malignity unbridled and audacity unparalleled, have made unkind thrusts at a people whose virtues and whose prowess they may vainly endeavor to deride, but can never successfully emulate.

That the heavy tax upon tobacco as upon spirits depresses the trade and curtails the revenue which by a more judicious system might be secured, is beyond question.

The statistics show that when the tax was at 40 cents the trade greatly languished, while the temptations and opportunities for fraud were increased. But when the tax was reduced to 32 cents, and then to 20 cents, production was stimulated, trade revived, the Government got its revenues, and in fact collected more than ever before during the same periods or under any other rates.

In support of my proposition I refer to the reports of the revenue department, which show that prior to July, 1868, when the tax was at 40 cents, less revenue was derived than after the reduction to 32 cents. For instance, we have:

Revenue collected 1868 at 40 cents tax	$18,655,630
Difference in favor of the lower rate	4,775,077

For several years under the operation of the decreased rate, as the same reports show, the revenue increased, but even then shrewd business men saw that the last-named rate was too high; that if 32 cents would yield so much, a decreased rate would yield more, so that on the 6th of June, 1872, Congress reduced the tax to a uniform rate of 20 cents. As the reduction of 1868 had operated well for the Government, so the advocates of reduction were not deceived in the result of the law of 1872, for we find from the reports these facts:

Revenue collected 1872 at 32 cents tax	$33,736,170
Or difference in favor of the lower tax	650,137

The crop of 1874 was a very short one; nevertheless the operations of that year under the lowered tax were very satisfactory to the Government. In March, 1875, under evil influences against the protest of all producers and manufacturers, and in opposition to some of the best minds in Congress, the tax was suddenly raised to 24 cents. The result was as usual, both the people and the Government were hurt by it. It is true that the Commissioner's report shows that the sum of $37,303,461 was collected the fiscal year ending June, 1875, which would evidence an increase, but the fact is, and the same report shows it, that most of this sum was collected during the eight months in which the twenty-cent tax operated. The report shows further that for months after the increase to 24 cents the receipts fell away, and were less even than those of the corresponding months of the year before. The conclusion is inevitable that if the tax had been allowed to remain at 20 cents the revenue for the year ending June 30, 1875, would have far exceeded the sum of $37,303,461, the amount really obtained; and reasoning upon the same basis we are justified in believing that if the tax of 20 cents had been allowed to remain the tobacco revenues of 1876 and 1877 would have been greater to the Government than they were.

But to the facts. I asserted that under the operations of the twenty-cent tax the revenues steadily increased. Take for example the months of January, 1874 and 1875, with tax at 20 cents:

In January, 1874, there were collected	$1,990,535
In February, 1874, there were collected	1,824,610
Or a total of	3,815,145

In the corresponding months of the following year with same tax of 20 cents:

Collected January, 1875	$1,378,828
Collected February, 1875	3,548,877

showing a steady improvement under the decreased rate, and an increase in receipts over the corresponding months of the year before of $1,112,500. In March, 1875, as I have said, the tax was raised to 24 cents, and the revenue report shows that in March, April, May, and June immediately following the increase the revenue, as compared with the same months of the year before fell off to the extent of $1,413,660. The same results followed but not to so large an extent in January and February, 1876, to a greater degree, however, in the same months of 1877, and far greater in January and February, 1878.

I will add to the Commissioner's information statements from the city of Danville, the center of the finest tobacco-growing region of the world:

From October 1, 1874, to March 1, 1875, there were collected at Danville with tax at 20 cents	$390,174 30
From October 1, 1875, to March 1, 1876, tax at 24 cents	341,184 75
Decrease and loss to Government	48,989 55

Again compare the collections for the month of February 1875, and the same month of 1876:

Collected at Danville, February, 1875, tax 20 cents	$166,345 30
Decrease and loss	118,184 05

Again, the collections from October 1, 1876, to March 1, 1877, were far less than for the corresponding periods of the year before, and so from October, 1877, to March, 1878, there was a falling away of revenue of fully one-fifth as compared with the same months of the previous fiscal year.

The statistics of Richmond, Petersburgh, and Lynchburgh show the same results, I am told.

The increase of the tax affected not only the manufactured article but the leaf also, as I can demonstrate. For the month of February, 1875, when the tax was at 20 cents, the average price of leaf-tobacco in the Danville market was $22.07. For the month of February, 1876, with tax at 24 cents, the average price of leaf in the same market was $10.04 per hundred-weight.

Again, from the 1st of October, 1874, to the 1st of March, 1875, with the tax at 20 cents, there were sold in the same market 5,297,348 pounds of tobacco for $1,144,610.70, or an average of $20.60 per hundred-weight. For the corresponding months of the next year, with the tax at 24 cents, were sold 8,107,952 pounds for $849,652.61, an average of $10.47. Thus we see 3,810,604 pounds more tobacco in certain months of the years 1875–'76, under the twenty-four-cent tax, sell for $294,958.09 less money than in the same months of 1874–'75 when the tax was 20 cents.

Moreover, from the 1st of October, 1876, to April 1, 1877, there were sold in Danville 5,176,543 pounds of tobacco for $729,109.86, an average of $14.08. For the corresponding months, from the 1st of October, 1877, to the 1st of April, 1878, were sold 10,533,212 pounds for $825,337.70, an average of $7.83. Here we have the astounding exhibit of double the quantity of tobacco sold and nearly one-half less money obtained for it. If further proof was needed I might say that the average price of leaf-tobacco is now far below $7. Worse than all, as affecting the question of production, I might show that from October, 1875, to October, 1876, there were sold in Danville 23,466,413 pounds tobacco, while between the same periods of the following year were sold only 16,426,296 pounds; an immense falling off. Nor was this falling off due to the fact that the tobacco was carried to other markets, for it was not, but to the fact that the cultivation of tobacco is being driven from the legitimate tobacco belt to other sections. According to the census reports Virginia raised in 1860 123,000,000 pounds tobacco.

The Commissioner of Agriculture says that the product of 1875 was 57,000,000, valued at $4,845,000, while the crop of 1876 amounted to only 49,300,000 pounds, of the value of $3,944,000. The crop of 1877 was perhaps something larger than for the two preceding years, but has so far as sold yielded less profit, and when fully disposed of will bring less money to the producer than either.

This showing would be a bad one for Virginia but for the fact that all the tobacco States proper present the same unhappy state of affairs. The same cause, the heavy tax, brings about the same wretched result in all.

As I have undertaken, Mr. Speaker, to show how the tax has affected production, it is well to inquire whether in like manner it has affected consumption. If the increase of consumption of manufactured tobacco for the years 1873 and 1874 under the twenty-cent tax is compared with that under the twenty-four cent rate for 1876–'77, this remarkable fact will appear, which I show by figures:

	Pounds.
Increase under tax rate, 20 cents, 1873–'74	25,243,000
Increase under tax rate, 24 cents, 1875–'76	3,989,000
Increase under lower rate	21,254,000

How gentlemen can reconcile these facts with the idea that a low rate of taxation has nothing to do with consumption passes my comprehension. Not only do they support my proposition, but they show in addition that if Congress had not interfered with the twenty-cent tax that consumption would so have increased that the tax realized last year would have really been greater than it was. Look at the subject as you choose and its situation is anything but flattering.

Prior to 1861 the cultivation of tobacco was principally confined to Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Maryland, Tennessee, and the seed leaf in Connecticut. Those few States in 1859,–'60, and '61 exported to foreign markets quite as much tobacco as has been exported in any three years since the war, notwithstanding the growth of the country and the extended area of the culture of the weed. What they did not export was readily sold for home consumption, and the crop was held as a stable reliable "money crop," which the producer could furnish at a price that paid him and invited consumption. But the case is different now. The productive energies of the people are paralyzed and the consumptive demand whether immediate or speculative for the manufactured article keeps pace neither with the growth nor the prosperity of the country.

Suppose such a tax as this was levied upon any other production of the soil or the production of any other section of the country. How long would Congress or the people stand it? How long do you suppose that the people of any other portion of this Government would submit to a taxation of 400 per cent. upon any of their staple products? Suppose you were to put a tax of 400 per cent. or even 200 per cent. upon the iron, coal-oil, or wool interests of the North and East. How long would it be before you would hear a cry of indignant distress which would shake this country from one end of it to the other, and how long would it be before bread riots and labor strikes would admonish Congress that relief must be granted and that speedily?

Why should the product of the tobacco sections be taxed more heavily than others, or why should their demands differ from those of other people?

Our demands, however, for the reduction are met by the assertion that the Government must have money; that tobacco is a noxious growth, that its cultivation is not a necessity, and that it is a luxury from which the Government as far as possible should extract its revenues.

Now this is chop logic of the worst kind. It is trifling with the rights of a people writhing under the effects of their wrongs.

The Government must, it is true, have sufficient means to carry on its operations; revenues for that purpose must be raised; but there is no justification for raising them to such an enormous extent from the staple production of one class of citizens or one section of the country. If tobacco is indeed a noxious plant, if its use and cultivation are so vicious and demoralizing, then why add further to the general wrong by pouring the proceeds of such wickedness into the public Treasury?

If it is a luxury and not a necessity, some new method should be resorted to for ministering to the appetites of the people, and a new field of enterprise opened up into which the inhabitants of the tobacco regions should be invited. In speaking upon this point in the last Congress, I said:

To tax a people whose locality, soil, and climate compel them to the production of a certain staple to the very verge of endurance, upon the vague pretext that that staple is a luxury, is ungenerous, unwise, and impolitic; ungenerous to the people taxed, unwise because too onerous, and impolitic because the extent of the taxation defeats production and diminishes the volume of revenue to be derived from the subject. Luxury indeed! Tobacco may be a luxury to you gentlemen of the North and East who burden us with taxation and who in the enjoyment of your otium cum dignitate chew and smoke our fine product, but it is a necessity to us. It is really our meat, drink, and wear; for from its sale we supply ourselves with not only the few luxuries we have but almost all the necessaries of life. The argument that the tax is borne by the "consumer" and not by the producer, is as unsound as it is fallacious. In the first place our own people along with others are consumers, and, unlike the people of any other section, are heavily taxed upon the use of our own products, while on the other hand our energies are paralyzed, our productions lessened, and our profits diminished by the embargo laid upon the fruits of our industry. The poorest system of political economy teaches that, as the area and extent of consumption is reduced and the demand diminished, to that same extent will industry be crippled and production curtailed. The heavy taxation of any commodity will decrease its consumption and impair the demand for it, and, in the same proportion in which you lessen its consumption and stifle demand, in that same proportion will you burden and injure production.

I do not mean to say that the consumer bears nothing of this tobacco tax; it is true he is burdened also; but my argument is to show that he is driven in great degree from the market by the weight of the tax, forced to consume less than he would otherwise do, thereby compelling the producer to lower prices and less production. That the planter has in the end to bear the evils of the tax no one can doubt, for no sooner does the Government tax the manufacturer than he throws it back upon the planter in the way of a reduced price for the commodity, and the planter having no one behind him upon whom he can thrust the burden must of necessity bear it.

But is the production of tobacco and the use of it a necessity or a mere luxury? Formerly tobacco was perhaps a mere luxury. If men had never used it, it might not be a necessity, but after years of use it becomes in the general acceptation of the term as much a necessity as anything that we eat or drink, and its votaries would as soon, nay rather, dispense with their tea and coffee than with their tobacco. It is used by all classes of our people; the high, the low, the rich, and the poor use it in some shape or other. The use is most general with the laboring masses, and a bad feature of this tax question is that its greatest weight falls upon those least able to bear it. These people have used tobacco for years; they will use it. It is their stimulant at work and their solace in trouble, notwithstanding the Government, without stint, continues such imposition upon it as would deter from the use of almost anything else.

In this view alone might it not be well for Congress to consider whether prudence would not dictate a mitigation of this burden upon the laboring-men of the country? Or does prudence dictate that we shall allow the luxuries of the rich to go untaxed, rather than those few enjoyed by the humble?

To the question: can the Government afford to lessen the tobacco tax? If during the pendency of the war, that period which inspired the tax, from eight to twelve million dollars were held sufficient to gather from that source, should not from twenty to twenty-five millions answer the demand now?

In 1867, I am told by gentlemen who were before the Ways and Means Committee, that General Schenck, its chairman, stated in presence of his committee that $25,000,000 was the maximum which the Government would ever require annually from tobacco in all its forms. How has that promise been kept? Instead of twenty-five millions the Government has since exacted of the people annually from thirty to thirty-five million dollars, and last year so much as $41,000,000.

The result has been, however, that the tax has proved too onerous and no one except the Government has profited by it. No profit has remained to the producer, manufacturer, or dealer, for the beggarly returns of the warehouse-man to the farmer has been only equaled by the dismal presentation of profits and losses by the manufacturer and dealer. To form an idea of the blighting effects of the tax gentlemen have only to learn some of the facts of the case.

The cultivation of tobacco requires not only the skilled but the constant labor of the farmer, from the plant-bed to the sales-room. The average production per acre is about 800 pounds. Add to the tax the hire of laborers, the price for fertilizers, and other expenses incident to the care and management of the crop, and you burden each acre of land cultivated not less than $200. No land, however fertile, can bear such a rate, and no country can stand up under such a system. As I have stated, the average price of the leaf in the fine tobacco section of Virginia from 1872 to 1875, when the tax was 20 cents, was over $20 per hundred-weight; after the tax was raised to 24 cents the average was reduced to about $10, and since then, under the grinding effects of the tax, tobacco has continued to decline, until now the average is no more than $7. Not only so, but much of the tobacco—indeed the greater part of it—sells for from $3 to $4 per hundred-weight, some for less, and very much of it not only leaves no margin for profit, but fails to pay the cost of production.

I was informed some time since by a prominent dealer that he had purchased in the Louisville market 100,000 pounds of tobacco, for which he paid $2,000, or 2 cents per pound. Of course that quantity of tobacco was made up of a number of small crops. Upon it the Government will lay a tax of $24,000; the profit to the Government will be enormous, but what reward will the poor farmers get for their hard labor? Two cents per pound, lessened by inspections, commissions, and warehouse charges, would probably leave 1½ cents per pound, or $1.50 per hundred pounds. Is there any margin for profit here? Can the producer labor for such earnings? This is not by any means a solitary case; many, very many such instances can, I am sorry to say, be presented.

Not only is the producer injured in the way I have mentioned, but the severity of the tax is lessening the production in the sections in which it has heretofore been mainly and best cultivated, driving it to other States and sections not suited to it, and where its culture has been hitherto unknown.

In those last-named States it is grown in small farms and patches, and is so grown with a view to avoid the tax upon the manufactured article, for it is used in the raw state free of tax. Injury in this way is not only done to the producers of the legitimate tobacco sections but the Government also, for to the extent that tobacco is raised in this patch and small farm way, and consumed by the producer, the Government loses its revenue.

In a few years this practice will become so general and injurious that new regulations will have to be resorted to by the Government hardly tolerable to the people, or the revenue from tobacco will be greatly diminished. Indeed it is not hard to foresee that in a few years, under the present system, tobacco will be greatly depreciated if not destroyed as a commercial product.

As the Government seems to look upon tobacco only as a revenue-producing plant it should be protected rather than burdened.

Our people, however, do not regard tobacco simply as a noxious weed or a revenue plant from which the Government extracts many millions of tribute, but we regard its culture as a vast industry, giving employment, food, and clothing to thousands of men, women, and children of every race, color, and condition who otherwise might be thrown upon the communities in which they live or sent out to swell the vast army of vagabonds and tramps or prove active agents in the seditions, riots, and strikes so menacing in these days of financial distress. We are compelled by reason of soil, climate, and other overruling influences to raise tobacco; and while we are willing to pay a reasonable tax upon our productions we are not willing to see them burdened as now. The tax is wholly disproportioned to the subject, and its effects are to destroy both producer and manufacturer. For several years past men of small means have scarcely been able to go into the manufacturing business. Their industry and enterprise have been lost to their families and the country, and their competition has not been felt in the market to the benefit of the producer or in the interests of commerce.

One of the direct effects of the tax has been to put the tobacco trade in the hands of men of large means, monopolists, who show neither liberality nor mercy to the unfortunate farmers, who, for the want of a competitive market, must sell at ruinous rates to the only persons able to conduct a business so heavily taxed.

The largest manufacturers of the country, those who have grown to the proportion of monopolists, do not wish the tax reduced. Of course they do not. The high rate is a blessing to them. It excludes from the market men of limited means while it builds up capitalists. Give these monopolists but a chance, keep up the present rate of taxation, and soon you will see all the dealers of moderate means driven from the trade and the planting communities and their products submitted to the tender mercies of those privileged, bloated vultures who having by aid of a system of class legislation broken down competition riot in devilish glee over the profits extorted from a wronged and helpless people. Able coadjutors, too, in this work of oppression do these monopolists find in the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But a short time ago Mr. Sherman, inspired thereto no doubt by the Commissioner, intruded upon Congress his unsought opinion upon the advisability of retaining the tobacco tax at its present rate, basing his ideas mainly upon the ground that the agitation of the question unsettled trade and damaged the revenue. Of course the agitation of a question like this will unsettle trade and injure the revenue, and it will continue to do so until the inciting cause is removed. Do not the Secretary and the Commissioner realize that fact? Cannot these public servants, but would-be masters in this business, understand that this oppressive tax system has been run to the very verge of endurance?

The revenue, they say, is falling away, and that of course too. The wonder is that it has not fallen off to a greater degree. This is but the "beginning of the end." The revenue will continue to fall away, not by reason of the "agitation" alone, but because, as I have said, the tax is greater than the subject can bear, because the planter can neither successfully raise nor the manufacturer "put up" tobacco at its present prices, and because thousands of consumers are driven to the use of the product in its leaf or raw state rather than pay the prices which the tax renders necessary to be demanded for the manufactured article. The advocates of reduction have long foreseen these consequences and have urged upon Congress the prudence of lowering the tax, but without avail. Without proper consideration, Congress has been induced to keep up this tax mainly by the encouraging reports of the heads of the Internal Revenue Bureau rendered from year to year. Those gentlemen, perhaps with pardonable pride and the natural love of power, have consulted rather the magnitude and importance of their position and Department than the welfare of the Government or good of the people. They have failed to perceive that this system of internal taxation, always distasteful to the American people, is proving too onerous in these dark and troublous times.

They have forgotten that ours is a Government "of the people, by the people, for the people." They think rather that it is the mission of Government to wring from the subject, not the citizen, the uttermost farthing that avarice can crave or power extort.

It would be amusing, however, if the subject were not so serious, to contemplate the change of front to which the Commissioner has lately been driven by the state of the tax question. In his last report he gives a very highly colored view of the whole system of internal taxes, its progress and successful development. Yet hardly was that report in print before he was forced to lament the depression in the tobacco trade and the falling off of revenue because of agitation in Congress and other causes. Let us see. Why did the revenue fall away for several months before Congress met? Why was the trade for months and months before Congress assembled in a depressed and languishing state? The reasons I have given. If the Commissioner's mind had not been wholly absorbed in the acquisition of shekels and the formation of rigid rules for their collection, if he had looked at both sides of the question and required the head of his tobacco department to devote his time to the acquisition of the true status of the subject upon which to base official action rather than to the preparation of an array of cunningly devised statistics and the publication of elaborate letters intended to affect the action of Congress, he could have seen what other persons long since saw and predicted, what the returns to his office were daily proving, that the weight and severity of the tax were defeating its ends and objects. The dilemma of the Commissioner is not more singular, however, than that of the Secretary of the Treasury, who issued the mandate to Congress that the tobacco tax must not be reduced.

I call Mr. Sherman to answer his own letter. I invite Mr. Sherman as a Senator, as a representative who claimed for himself a broad and expansive statesmanship, as a representative of the interests of the great West and her people, to confront the same Mr. Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury.

On the 1st day of March, 1875, in a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States, which can be found in volume 2, page 1947, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1874–75, Mr. Sherman opposed the increase of the whisky as well as the tobacco tax, and stated in reference to the latter tax:

> Now I come to the tobacco tax. It is an article that ought to be taxed as much as it will bear, but have we not taxed it as much as it will bear? We once taxed it 16 cents and 32 cents. We found that the 32 cents was evaded and we were cheated. After strong appeals made by the dealers, by the consumers, by all classes, we finally, only two short years ago, agreed to reduce the tax to a uniform rate of 20 cents. Then it was done by the concurrence of the Treasury Department, the tobacco trade, and the men who raise the tobacco, and we thought we had established a fair rate at 20 cents a pound, and it was honestly collected, and yields us $36,000,000 on tobacco in its various forms, and being the second item of revenue in amount. Now suddenly at the close of a Congress we are called upon to advance the tax to 24 cents. That 4 cents is about the value of the great body of the tobacco produced in this country, and much of it is sold for less than that. If we could collect it without any doubt or trouble or interfering with our honorable agricultural industry we might properly levy it, but we have remonstrances from dealers, we have remonstrances without number from the little cigar dealers who make their living in rolling up their tobacco in the form of cigars, saying it will ruin their trade. Are we not bound to heed them, because they are engaged in a business that the people who do not like tobacco dislike? They tell us: "Only two years ago you fixed this law; you gave us some security for permanancy; now you disregard your own law; you raise your revenue." I cannot answer that. I believe that the increase of the tobacco tax is wrong in the revenue point of view. It is wrong because it does not treat the dealers, the men who raise the tobacco, the men who manufacture it, as they ought to be treated by a great and powerful Government.

Compare the speech of Mr. Sherman with his late letter to Congress, and you find a strange conflict of views emanating from the same person. But Mr. Sherman was right when he made his speech. Then he was speaking his honest views in behalf of a wronged people and an oppressed industry. Now he is shaping the blind policy of a weak and vacillating administration.

I leave Mr. Sherman to wrestle with his own conflicting opinions, with the simple remark that he will find it very hard to answer his own arguments and harder still to convince the country and Congress of the sincerity of his present position.

It is very plain that if 20 cents was a sufficient tax when Mr. Sherman spoke, it would be far too high now; and if $35,000,000 was enough to raise from the product in those years of greater prosperity than now, that sum should satisfy even those who, without stint or mercy, are willing to impose taxation upon any subject or product save those in which they and their people are interested.

A most remarkable feature in all this business is that when Congress raised the tax 4 cents per pound, the price of tobacco did not rise to the consumer, hence the small increase of 3,957,000 pounds consumption in the years 1876–'77, to which I have alluded. Yet the revenue department says there was an increase of revenue, during those years, of $9,567,734. Now, if this is true, somebody sustained a heavy loss upon the increase of the tax. The leaf fell in price from 3 to 4 cents per pound, that is certain, so that the proportion of loss which must have accrued to the planter, even at 3 cents per pound, amounted to about $6,795,801, and the balance, as represented by the alleged increase of revenue as mentioned, was sustained by the unhappy manufacturers and dealers, forty-eight hundred and twenty-nine of whom, according to the Commissioner's report, were driven from the business last year.

To present this matter in another and perhaps a stronger light, in its effects upon the planting interests of the country, I will mention these facts: the total amount of tobacco grown in the United States in the year 1876, according to the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, was 351,000,000 pounds. Of this amount, 107,000,000 pounds were manufactured, and the rest, 244,000,000 pounds, exported. There was a loss upon this vast crop of tobacco corresponding and equal to the increase of tax upon tobacco, say 3 cents on manufactured and 1 cent per pound on exported tobacco. Aggregate the crop, leaf and manufactured, and this result appears:

Three cents on 107,000,000 pounds	$3,210,000
One cent on 244,000,0000 pounds	2,440,000
Or loss to planters, in 1876	5,650,000

The rate of 24 cents affects not only the grower, manufacturer, and consumer, but the Government also. It is true that more revenue was collected last year from tobacco than ever before, but a great deal of it was from tobacco grown and manufactured in former years which the stringency of the times threw upon the market at ruinous rates. The increase was evidently not a healthy one, for in the same breath with which the Commissioner boasts of his increase he shows that it required an increase of 20 per cent. of tax to produce an increase of 5 per cent. of revenue. But why should there not have been an increase? The country since 1875, when the law was changed, has greatly grown in population, wealth, and in all its trade and commercial relations, and notwithstanding the law is a bad one, the natural growth and prosperity of the country should have compelled even a much larger increase of production and consequently of revenue.

But I deny the Commissioner's statement. There has been no increase of production in the legitimate tobacco belt, and little or no increase in manufacture since 1875. On the contrary there has been a decrease in both, and the apparent spasmodic increase of revenue last year came, I say, from the growth of former years, and the closer collection of the revenue under a more perfected system. Yet what a beautiful system that must be indeed which requires an increase of 20 per cent. of tax to be heaped upon the tobacco interest to produce an increase of 5 per cent. of revenue!

Again, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Revenue seem to attribute the falling off of revenue in part to the labor strikes of last summer. "Labor strikes," indeed! What had they to do either with the production of whisky and tobacco, or the revenue from either or both? The strikes did not occur in the tobacco regions, and they had no more to do with the production or collection of internal revenue than they had with the changes of the moon. The labor strikes were not directed against the material prosperity of the country, nor yet against its productive interests. They were brought about by the bad, pernicious system of government which has afflicted this country for many years. They were encouraged by the effort, successful to too great a degree, to throw the burdens of taxation upon the labor and poverty of the country rather than upon its prosperity and wealth. The bad government was inaugurated at the instance and in the interest of rings and corporations, great railroad and other corporations created by Congress in an evil hour, which have grown so strong and so insolent that they not only endeavor to dictate and control legislation, but are almost as ready to throttle their creator as they are to crush out the rights of the toiling masses; at the instance of great capitalists, the Astors, Vanderbilts, and others, who deem tobacco and liquor most excellent subjects of grinding taxation, while with hard cheek and harder mouths they deprecate as impolitic, insolent, and inquisitorial any effort to place a modest tax upon their lordly estates or princely incomes.

Unfortunately men in high places favor the demands and cater to the wishes of these corporations and men of wealth who direct them. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his last report, instead of recommending a diminution of tax upon some product of the soil or some subject where the burden is laid without regard to uniformity, advised that if any reduction is made it shall be upon banks, bank-checks, &c., which yield the Government $8,695,908. And especially does he recommend the repeal of the tax upon matches, which yields $2,782,275, a tax which is upon consumption alone of an article universally used. Oh, yes, says the Commissioner, if you are going to reduce taxation take it off the banks. Oh! the banks! they cannot stand taxation, but tobacco, the bloated farming interest, can, perhaps!

I despise the cry of the "poor against the rich;" I abhor any effort to array class against class or labor against capital; but I leave it to any fair-minded man to say whether the course of legislation in this country has not of late years been such as to encourage, nay to invite conflicts greatly to be deplored; whether it has not in fact been directed against the labor and productive resources of the country rather than against existing evils or with any view to the fair and equal distribution of burdens. For these things the people have complained, and they will continue to complain until some change is inaugurated which will distribute governmental impositions upon each and every section alike and upon poverty and wealth in a fair and judicious way.

I have said thus much, Mr. Speaker, in a general way; but, coming again to my subject, I assert that it will be to the interest of the Government to reduce the tax to 16 cents, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. No one doubts that as long as the tax remains as at present the question of its repeal or reduction will be urged, renewed, and intensified at each succeeding session of Congress. During all that time the Government and people suffer; but modify the tax and immediate benefit will accrue to all. So great will be the stimulus imparted to the tobacco interest by a reduction of tax that in a few months instead of diminishing, the Commissioner will report increasing returns and in less than two years, indeed so soon as the tax rate can adjust itself to the subject, more revenue will be raised from tobacco than ever before. I grant you that for the first year the revenue may appear diminished; it will so appear anyway, for it is steadily diminishing now, but in two years we will get more revenue than last year. I think I can show that reduction will not by any means reduce revenues as some think.

	Pounds.
The amount of tobacco consumed last year, as shown by the Commissioner's report, was	116,722,055
Increased consumption by reducing rate to 16 cents.	39,000,000
Substitution of manufactured for raw leaf consumed,	20,000,000
Total	175,722,055
This amount of tobacco will produce revenue to the extent, at 16 cents, of	$28,115,528 80
Then add for tax on cigars, cigarettes, snuff, special tax on manufacturers, dealers, &c	13,000,000 00
And we have the sum of	$41,115,528 80

actually more than was paid in the year 1877 with the tax at 24 cents. This statement is by no means an unreasonable one, when we consider the great increase of consumption induced by the operations of the 20-cent tax of which I have spoken, and when we remember, as is confidently believed, that not less that 35,000,000 pounds of tobacco annually escape taxation by being consumed in the raw state, which would not be if the tax permitted the use of the manufactured article at a reasonable price.

The revenue derived from tobacco last year amounted to $41,106,546.92. The Commissioner admits that he cannot expect so much for the year ending June 30, 1878. Indeed, the records show now that the receipts from internal revenue, made up mainly from whisky and tobacco, are falling off. I here mention in evidence a few facts which I have learned. The revenue for the first nine days of April, 1877, aggregated receipts, $2,823,521.92. For the corresponding days of April, 1878, the receipts aggregated $2,434,771.95, or a comparative decrease of $388,749.97. A fearful exhibit. But the worst has not been told. From July 1, 1876, to April 9, 1877, the revenue receipts were $88,908,322.29. From July 1, 1877, to April 9, 1878, the collections aggregated $83,179,993.95, or a decrease and comparative loss to the Government of $5,728,388.24. And so we go on losing day by day, until it is hard to say what loss will actually be realized by the end of this fiscal year.

These statements put to flight the fine-spun theories indulged that the falling away of revenue was due to agitation, labor strikes, &c. The decrease has mainly shown itself in months when there were neither agitation nor labor strikes; and more in reference to all subjects of internal taxation, whether tobacco or other, and whether subjects of agitation or not.

It is plain that from tobacco no more than $35,000,000 will be realized the present fiscal year. Under the operations of a twelve or even sixteen cent tax we can give more for the year 1879, with a promise of steady increase thereafter from year to year.

Hitherto, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of the effect of the tax upon the producer, but it would be unjust not to say in behalf of that large, intelligent, and enterprising class, the manufacturers, that they, too, suffer heavily from the tax. Not only are they injured by the same causes which affect the producing classes, but they have in addition many troubles inseparable from their trade, which only incidentally affect the planter and consumer.

Manufacturers are required to use in the conduct of their business at least four times the capital demanded for any other pursuit of like extent. In general they are compelled to pay cash for their stocks of leaf, while their sales are usually made through factors upon a credit of from three to six months. For the most part their capital is borrowed at a heavy rate of interest—interest which attaches upon the amount paid for stamps as well as tobacco. In addition they suffer from the ordinary fluctuations of trade, the rigid rules of the internal system, as also the evil results flowing from the annual agitation of the question. Put all these things together and it is easy to see how fearfully they affect the interests, if not the rights, of both manufacturer and Government.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I will mention another matter, because most intimately connected with the tobacco trade. At an early day of the session I introduced a bill providing for the free importation of licorice to be used, under proper restrictions, in the manufacture of tobacco. The Committee of Ways and Means did not think proper to report that bill, but in lieu thereof reported in favor of reducing the licorice tax to 5 cents per pound. This tax ought to be abolished. About two-thirds of the licorice imported into this country is used in the manufacture of tobacco; the remainder is used in medicines, confections, &c. The present law imposes a tax of 10 cents per pound gold upon the importation, and its effect is to insure a double tax upon all licorice used upon tobacco, first by way of the import tax, next the 24 cents internal tax upon tobacco, aggregating 34 cents upon every pound of licorice used in manufacture.

The tax is onerous as well as discriminating and impolitic. The manufacturers of "fine-cut" tobacco in their operations use only the powdered licorice-root, which is imported duty free. Plug manufacturers use the mass or stick. Unable to pay the high duty upon imported licorice, many of our manufacturers are compelled to use inferior licorice of American make—made of licorice-root deteriorated and damaged by a long sea voyage—or resort to cheap substitutes, whereby the quality and flavor of their tobacco are greatly injured, not only in our own but in foreign markets. Because of this duty upon licorice, the tobacco trade has suffered greatly, not only in the advantage given thereby to foreign manufacturers, but also from the fact that it has stimulated and built up large manufactories in Canada, Australia, and elsewhere, run with American tobaccos.

It is very surprising that this tax has been kept up with its effects so manifestly injurious to American interests; but it is still more surprising that the American Congress should in respect to this subject have been for several years legislating for the protection, not of its own, but of foreign manufacturers. I know that we have advocates of protection, but I had never supposed that the most intense advocates of that system would carry their views "beyond seas," and insist upon protecting the outside world as against ourselves.

The repeal of this tax would result in putting our own on an equal footing with foreign manufactures, by increasing greatly our exports, cheapening the manufacture of tobacco, thereby increasing consumption and consequently the revenue. The evils of this tax are apparent and call loudly for its repeal.

In view, Mr. Speaker, of the great interest involved, I think that Congress should pause now in its deliberations and give some heed to the wishes of the people of a large extent of country. I have endeavored in a plain way to show that the tobacco tax is oppressive and discriminating, if, indeed, not unconstitutional; that it is unjust to the producer, the manufacturer, and the consumer, as well as injurious to the revenues of the Government. The producer suffers, because his, of all other agricultural products, is singled out for taxation; that his industrial pursuit, to which he is compelled by the peculiarities of climate, soil, and habit, is heavily burdened, his bone and muscle, his energy, his toil, his poverty, all are made to pay tribute to the Government, while other sections, other industries, and other productions go free of tax, and, indeed, are made to prosper by reason of the very impositions upon tobacco.

The manufacturer suffers because he must carry at vast outlay, not only his stock but his stamps, because he is hedged about by annoying regulations and is subjected not only to the ordinary vicissitudes of trade, but to the constant agitation which ever attends an onerous tax.

The consumer suffers because, having contracted the free use of tobacco, he regards it more as a necessity than a luxury, because many of the poorer classes, the greatest consumers, by the enhanced price consequent upon the tax, are driven in great degree from the market, and forced to the use of the meaner grades of tobacco, while the rich alone can indulge in the luxury of the fine.

The Government suffers because the tax rate is so high that it discourages production, manufacture, and consumption, promotes fraud, paralyzes trade, and in short, by its oppressiveness, defeats in great degree the ends and objects of the whole revenue system.

Under these circumstances it behooves Congress, at the earliest practicable moment, to act upon the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and reduce the tax to twelve cents, as it ought to be, or at any rate to sixteen cents, as recommended by the committee.

In any event, let us have speedy action upon the subject. Delay is injurious, nay, almost ruinous, to the entire interest. Congress has now the opportunity to settle the question, and we of the tobacco sections earnestly hope that the whole matter may be so justly settled that we will have no more trouble with it or agitation of the subject again for a number of years. If adjusted wisely, by a proper reduction, I feel that we can assure Congress that our great industry will loom up in its full proportions. New life and energy will be infused into a depressed and languishing trade, thousands of enforced idlers will be given profitable employment, the tobacco regions will assume their old prosperity, and the Government coffers will fill and fatten under the inspiration of a system more tolerant, more just, and more humane than any we have had for years.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. RIDDLE. Mr. Speaker, on the 4th day of February last I had the honor of introducing a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to elect the President and Vice-President by a direct vote of the people, and providing for a second election from the two persons receiving the greatest number of votes if neither received a majority of all the votes cast at the first election, and that amendment is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States for adoption:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. The President and Vice-President of the United States shall be elected by a direct vote of the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the same qualifications as the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The person receiving the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, and person receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be the Vice-President: Provided, That each shall have received a majority of the whole number of votes cast in all the States for President and Vice-President.

SEC. 2. If neither of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President shall have received a majority of all the votes cast at the first election, then a second election shall be held, not exceeding two months from the date of the first election; and from the two persons on the list voted for as President and Vice-President in said first election having the highest number of votes, the people shall choose the President and Vice-President.

SEC. 3. If at the second election there should be an equal number of votes cast for the two persons voted for as President and Vice-President, then the Senate and House of Representatives as a joint body, each Senator and Representative having one vote, shall from said two persons voted for as President and from said two persons voted for as Vice-President, choose by a viva voce vote the President and the Vice-President.

SEC. 4. The Congress shall declare by law when the elections provided for in this article shall be held, and when, and in what manner, and by what authority the returns of said elections shall be canvassed and the votes cast for President and Vice-President counted.

In the formation of our Government the main object of the fathers was to give full expression and effective force to the will of the people. It was intended that the ballot should execute that will without let or hinderance. It was not contemplated or imagined that the forms of the Federal Constitution would be so perverted as to defeat the will of the people and set up an administration upon a minority of their suffrages. The people may be deceived in their choice of an object; but any choice they may make cannot be so very mischievous as the existence of any human force capable of resisting it or subverting it.

The indirect method of election of the President and Vice-President by the electoral college, as provided for in the Constitution, was not intended by its framers to defeat the will of the people; but it was designed to harmonize with and execute that will. Alexander Hamilton, in the sixty-eighth number of the Federalist, says of this mode of appointment of the Chief Magistrate of the United States:

It was desirable that the sense of the people should operate in the choice of the person to whom so important a trust was to be confided. This end will be answered by committing the right of making it not to any pre-established body but to men chosen by the people for the special purpose and at the particular conjuncture. * * * Another and no less important desideratum was that the Executive should be independent for his continuance in office of all but the people themselves.

The paramount considerations operating upon the convention of 1787 that framed our present Constitution, and that led to the adoption of the electoral college as the method of choosing the highest executive officer in our Government, were the desirability of "affording as little opportunity as possible to tumult and disorder" in the election, the prevention of violence and convulsion in the community over the choice of the "final object of the public wishes," and the opposition of "every practicable obstacle to cabal, intrigue, and corruption."

In the same number of the Federalist to which reference has been made above, Mr. Hamilton further says:

But as a majority of the votes might not always happen to center in one man, and as it might be unsafe to permit less than a majority to be conclusive, it is provided that in such a contingency the House of Representatives shall select out of the candidates who shall have the five highest number of votes the man who in their opinion may be best qualified for the office.

It will be seen from these citations that the paramount consideration with the founders of our Government was that the person chosen to fill the highest and most important office in that Government should, if possible, have received the majority of the entire popular vote of the country, so as to establish him in the esteem and confidence of the whole Union and render successful and satisfactory the administration of his distinguished office. When there should be a failure to elect before the people, they provided that an election should be made by that House of Congress which was designed immediately to represent the people and to be sensitive to, and a faithful reflector of, public opinion.

Two periods have been passed in the history of the United States when the electoral college has failed to reflect the popular will, and when Presidents have been inaugurated who were not chosen by the people; and they will forever stand out as monumental periods in our political history and warn all future generations of American freemen of the imminent danger of their repetition. Whenever it shall be distinctly understood that a President may be inaugurated with impunity who has not been elected by the people, then the road to empire will be opened, the Republic will be subverted, and upon its rotten pillars may be written the words, "Ichobod, Ichabod, for its glory has departed."

The first of these periods occurred in 1825 when John Quincy Adams was elected, in strict accordance with the forms of the Constitution, by the House of Representatives over Andrew Jackson, who had received the largest vote before the people and in the electoral college. There was great dissatisfaction over the result and the people could never be induced to believe otherwise than that Jackson had been cheated out of the Presidency by Clay and Adams. Mr. Clay afterward acknowledged to Dr. Colton, when he was writing the life of the Great Commoner at Ashland, that his connection with John Quincy Adams in this affair was the great mistake of his life, and that he had underestimated the "power of detraction in a republican government." There is no doubt of the fact that his support of Adams against Jackson lost him the Presidency which he so much coveted.

In 1828 the people righted the great wrong which they believed had been done General Jackson by his triumphant election to the Presidency, and they repeated the honor in 1832 as they had uniformly done from the foundation of the Government in the case of all the incumbents but two. In his first message to Congress General Jackson called the attention of that body to the defects in the mode prescribed by the Constitution for the election of President and Vice-President, and recommended an amendment to remedy those defects. I will quote in full all he says in that message upon the subject, December 8, 1829:

I consider it one of the most urgent of my duties to bring to your attention the propriety of amending that part of our Constitution which relates to the election of a President and Vice-President. Our system of government was by its framers deemed an experiment, and they therefore consistently provided a mode of remedying its defects.

To the people belongs the right of electing their Chief Magistrate; it was never designed that their choice should, in any case, be defeated, either by the intervention of electoral colleges, or by the agency confided, under certain contingencies, to the House of Representatives. Experience proves that, in proportion as agents to execute the will of the people are multiplied, there is danger of their wishes being frustrated. Some may be unfaithful, all are liable to err. So far, therefore, as the people can with convenience speak, it is safer for them to express their own will.

The number of aspirants to the Presidency, and the diversity of the interests which may influence their claims, leave little reason to expect a choice in the first instance; and in that event, the election must devolve on the House of Representatives, where it is obvious the will of the people may not be always ascertained, or, if ascertained, may not be regarded. From the mode of voting by States, the choice is to be made by 24 votes; and it may often occur that one of those may be controlled by an individual Representative. Honors and offices are at the disposal of the successful candidate.

Repeated ballotings may make it apparent that a single individual holds the cast in his hand. May he not be tempted to name his reward? But even without corruption—supposing the probity of the Representative to be proof against the powerful motives by which he may be assailed—the will of the people is still constantly liable to be misrepresented.

One may err from ignorance of the wishes of his constituents; another from a conviction that it is his duty to be governed by his own judgment of the fitness of the candidate; finally, although all were inflexibly honest—all accurately informed of the wishes of their constituents—yet, under the present mode of election, a minority may often elect a President; and when this happens, it may reasonably be expected that efforts will be made on the part of the majority to rectify this injurious operation of their institutions. But although no evil of this character should result from such a perversion of the first principles of our system—that the majority is to govern—it must be very certain that a President elected by a minority cannot enjoy the confidence necessary to the successful discharge of his duties.

In this, as in all other matters of public concern, policy requires that as few impediments as possible should exist to the free operation of the public will. Let us then endeavor so to amend our system that the office of Chief Magistrate may not be conferred upon any citizen but in pursuance of a fair expression of the will of the majority.

I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice-President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election; and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment, it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years.

In his second annual message of December 7, 1830, General Jackson repeated the recommendation of his first message for an amendment to the Constitution to secure to the people a direct choice of their Chief Magistrate and his ineligibility after one term of service; and he supported his recommendation by arguments similar to those contained in his first message. Those arguments have gathered strength by the lapse of time. They were unanswerable then and they are unanswerable now. They should have secured such an amendment to the Constitution then; but, as they failed to do so then, their potency should avail to secure the adoption of such an amendment now. If the Constitution had been amended previous to 1860, as recommended by General Jackson, which recommendation is embodied in the joint resolution offered by myself on the 4th February, 1878, and cited in the beginning of my remarks on this occasion, the great civil convulsion of 1861 to 1865 would have been averted and the defeat of the will of the people by the electoral commission in 1877 would never have occurred.

In 1860 neither of the four candidates—Lincoln, Douglas, Breckinridge, and Bell—received a majority of all the votes cast at the presidential election of that year. If the Constitution had then required a second election to determine by a majority vote which of the two candidates having the greatest number of votes in the first election (and they were Lincoln and Douglas) should be the President, Douglas would have been elected and there would have been no secession and no war.

Under the amendment I have proposed, if it had been a part of the Constitution in 1876, Samuel J. Tilden would have been inaugurated President of the United States without the least excitement, disturbance, or opposition, because it is an undeniable and unquestionable fact that he received a majority of over two hundred and fifty thousand of the popular vote in the last presidential election.

Mr. Bancroft, in his History of the United States, (vol. 9, page 55,) informs us that the great compromise of the Constitution, and which secured its adoption, was evolved from the thought expressed by Jefferson of Virginia and Sherman of Connecticut. Sherman said the "vote should be taken two ways: call the colonies and call the individuals, and have a majority of both." This idea he probably derived from Jefferson, who enforced in private as the means to save the Union that "any proposition might be negatived by the representatives of a majority of the people or a majority of the colonies."

Mr. Madison, in the thirty-eighth number of the Federalist, says:

The proposed Constitution, therefore, is, in strictness, neither a national nor a Federal Constitution, but a composition of both. * * * * *

The House of Representatives will derive its powers from the people of America, and the people will be represented in the same proportion, and on the same principle, as they are in the Legislature of a particular State. So far the Government is national, not federal. The Senate, on the other hand, will derive its powers from the States as political and coequal societies; and these will be represented on the principle of equality in the Senate as they now are in the existing Congress. So far the Government is federal, not national. The executive power will be derived from a very compound source. The immediate election of the President is to be made by the States in their political characters. The votes allotted to them are in a compound ratio, which considers them partly as distinct and coequal societies, partly as unequal members of the same society. The eventual election again is to be made by that branch of the Legislature which consists of the national representatives; but in this particular act, they are to be thrown into the form of individual delegations, from so many distinct and coequal bodies politic. From this aspect of the government, it appears to be of a mixed character, presenting at least as many federal as national features.

He then defines the distinction between a federal and a national government, the former operating "on the political bodies composing the confederacy in their political capacities," and the latter "on the individual citizens composing the nation in their individual capacities," and finally arrives at the conclusion that "the operation of the government on the people in their individual capacities, in its ordinary and most essential proceedings, may, on the whole, designate it in this relation a national government."

Inasmuch, then, as we have a national government, "operating in its ordinary and essential proceedings upon the people in their individual capacities," and as these operations are under the control of, and directed by, the Chief Executive of the Government, there can be no infraction of its fundamental principles by requiring the election of that Chief Executive by a direct vote of the people, who are so deeply affected in their individual capacities by the acts of his administration.

It evidently was not the design of the founders of our Government that the choice of the people should be defeated in any case either by the intervention of electoral colleges or by the agency confided, under certain circumstances, to the House of Representatives. But the will of the people has already been twice defeated under the provisions of our present Constitution; and oftener than twice have Presidents been inaugurated in accordance with that Constitution who received only a plurality and not a majority of the popular vote. The electoral college has become a mere form in the election of the President and Vice-President. The idea of the fathers in the establishment of that form has long since become obsolete, for the people now really and in fact but without proper effect, as was demonstrated in the last presidential election, vote for President and Vice-President; and no discretion is left to any presidential elector to vote for any other candidates for President and Vice-President than those whose election he is required to advocate by the political party to which he belongs and whose names always appear at the head of the ticket upon which his own name is printed as a presidential elector.

In a speech of great ability and power made in the Senate of the United States, February 3, 1824, advocating the election of President and Vice-President by a direct vote of the people, Thomas H. Benton said:

By the Constitution it was intended that the electoral office should be one of the first dignity in the Republic. The electors were to be selected men, chosen by the people on account of their superior virtue and intelligence, and left to make choice of a President according to their own enlightened understanding, without the slightest control from the less informed multitude. This was the intention, but the plan has wholly failed in the execution. The electors are not independent; they have no superior intelligence; they are not left to their own judgment in the choice of President; they are not above the control of the people. On the contrary every elector is pledged before he is chosen to give his vote according to the will of those who choose him. He is nothing but an agent, tied down to the execution of a precise trust. Every reason which induced the convention to institute electors has failed. They are no longer of any use, and may be dangerous to the liberties of the people. They are not useful, because they have no power over their own vote, and because the people can vote for a President as easily as they can vote for an elector. * * * Candidates for electors are now selected, not for the reasons mentioned in the Federalist, but for their devotion to a particular party, for their popular manners, and their talent at electioneering.

Every reason for instituting electors has failed and every consideration of prudence requires them to be discontinued. They are nothing but agents in a case which requires no agent, and no prudent man would or ought to employ an agent to take care of his money, his property, or his liberty when he is equally capable to take care of it himself. * * * I should be opposed to the intervention of electors, because the double process of electing a man to elect a man would paralyze the spirit of the people and destroy the life of the election itself.

Judge Story in section 1463 of his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States expresses himself with great felicity upon this subject, as follows:

It has been observed with much point that in no respect have the enlarged and liberal views of the framers of the Constitution and the expectations of the public when it was adopted been so completely frustrated as in the practical operation of the system so far as relates to the independence of the electors in the electoral colleges. It is notorious that the electors are now chosen wholly with reference to particular candidates, and are silently pledged to vote for them. Nay, upon some occasions the electors publicly pledge themselves to vote for a particular person, and thus in effect the whole foundation of the system, so elaborately constructed, is subverted.

The candidates for the Presidency are selected and announced in each State long before the election, and an ardent canvass is maintained in the newspapers, in party meetings, and in the State Legislatures to secure votes for the favorite candidate and to defeat his opponents. Nay, the State Legislatures often become the nominating body, acting in their official capacities, and recommending by solemn resolves their own candidate to the other States, so that nothing is left to the electors after their choice but to register votes which are already pledged, and an exercise of an independent judgment would be treated as a political usurpation, dishonorable to the individual and a fraud upon his constituents.

I have therefore, after much reflection, arrived at the conclusion that it is best for the peace and good order of society in this country and for the stability and perpetuity of our free institutions that the electoral college should be abolished and that the Constitution of the United States should be amended in the manner I have proposed; and I am fortified in that conviction by the high authority of Thomas H. Benton and Judge Story, who have declared that "in effect, the whole foundation of the system, so elaborately constructed, is subverted," a declaration that must be corroborated by the personal knowledge of every intelligent citizen in the land.

If the electoral college is retained it should be so modified by a constitutional amendment as to reflect with accurate fidelity the will of the people at every presidential election. It should be provided that the choice of the college and the choice of the people should always concur to effect an election; and if they should not concur, that the choice of the people should prevail over that of the electoral college; and if the relative strength of the States is to be preserved as at present in the election of President and Vice-President, that preservation should be conditioned upon a similar concurrence of the choice of the States and the choice of the people to effectuate an election, and with a provision that in the event of a disagreement between the choice of the States and the choice of the people, the choice of the people should prevail.

But the effect of such a modification would be the substantial nullification or supersession of the electoral college, as will be readily seen; and for that reason I am settled in the conviction that the electoral college should be eliminated altogether from our elective presidential machinery. There is great force in what was said by Mr. James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, in the convention which framed our Constitution in 1787. He declared himself first and last in favor of an election of President by the people. "Experience in the States," said he, "had shown that the election of a First Magistrate by the people at large was both convenient and successful;" and that the "objects of choice in such cases must be persons whose merits had general notoriety."

And Mr. Madison, in speaking of the source of appointment, said:

The people at large was, in his opinion, the fittest in itself. It would be as likely as any that could be devised to produce an executive magistrate of distinguished character. The people generally could only know and vote for some citizen whose merits had rendered him an object of general attention and esteem. There was one difficulty, however, of a serious nature, attending an immediate choice by the people. The right of suffrage was much more diffusive in the Northern than the Southern States; and the latter could have no influence in the election on the score of the negroes. The substitution of electors obviated this difficulty, and seemed on the whole to be liable to fewest objections.

This difficulty in the immediate choice by the people of the President, has been entirely removed by the enfranchisement of the negroes by the recent action of all the States.

It must be manifest to the most ordinary intellect that the people are as competent to elect a President by a direct vote as they are to elect by that method the governor of a State; and every State in the American Union now elects its chief executive officer in that way. The intelligence of the people was underestimated by the statesmen of 1787, and that fact is apparent when the debates on the adoption of the Federal Constitution, as reported by Mr. Madison, are read:

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, conceived it would be as unnatural to refer the choice of a proper person for a Chief Magistrate to the people as it would to refer a trial of colors to a blind man. The extent of the country rendered it impossible that the people could have the requisite capacity to judge of the respective pretensions of the candidates.

This opinion was shared by most of the members of the convention of 1787, and it is not at all strange that it should have been so shared, when it is remembered that they were educated under a monarchical form of government and that they had been for a very brief period under tuition in the school of republican liberty, a period too brief to enable them to entirely overcome their inherited distrust of the people.

The virtual subversion of the electoral system by the requirement of a pledge by the presidential electors that they would support certain nominated candidates, a pledge that they could not disregard without personal dishonor and the perpetration of a fraud upon the people and a political usurpation, abundantly justifies its actual abolition.

Chancellor Kent has wisely said in his Commentaries that—

If ever the tranquillity of this nation is to be disturbed and its liberties endangered by a struggle for power, it will be upon this very subject of the choice of a President.

Every intelligent citizen will remember, with a mingled feeling of apprehension and gratitude, the narrow escape from such a danger made by our country in the last presidential election; and the fervent wish of every true patriot must be that adequate preventives should be adopted to avoid the recurrence of a similar peril.

Such a disturbance of the national tranquillity and such a danger to constitutional liberty can be effectually prevented by the adoption of such an amendment to our Federal Constitution as the one I had the honor to propose on the 4th of February, 1878, and which was first recommended to Congress for adoption by General Jackson, in his first annual message of December 8, 1829, and which was recommended again in his second annual message of December 7, 1830.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM—PROTECTION TO AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, it was often remarked by one of the wisest and most logical of the orators and statesmen of ancient Greece that every speaker should commence his argument with an incontestable proposition. In compliance with this injunction, I will present, at the threshold of the remarks I submit to-day, the following axiomatic proposition:

THE WELFARE OF THE PEOPLE SHOULD EVER BE THE HIGHEST CONSIDERATION OF GOVERNMENT.

In all legislation this should be the chief aim. An enlightened selfishness should be the potential influence shaping all our enactments. If we fail to practically realize that this is the highest and most important of all our duties as the legislators of this great people, we are unprofitable servants, no longer worthy of the generous support of a confiding constituency. The common good of all the people! What higher aim can actuate the true statesman! To what more noble purpose can he devote the best energies of heart and intellect?

Sir, much has been said during the present Congress upon this floor on behalf of the people. Gentlemen have apparently manifested the greatest interest on their behalf. Some members have become so eloquent in depicting the wrongs endured by the laboring class as almost to cause the very stones themselves to cry out in sympathy; and yet these very members when asked for bread have given a stone, or for a fish have kindly offered a serpent. Well may the workingman exclaim, "Miserable comforters are ye all. We don't want your honeyed expressions of sympathy; we want work, that we may clothe our wives and feed our little ones, that they starve not." The remedies proposed for the hard times, which, like blight and mildew, curse every portion of our fair land, have so far related solely to the financial measures of the Government and have resolved themselves into two propositions: first, the repeal of the resumption act; secondly, the remonetization of the silver dollar; the latter of which has become a law. These, we were assured, would remove the paralysis of business and inaugurate a new era of prosperity and industrial activity. That they may do something in this direction I grant; but those who look to them as the brazen serpent which shall bring full relief for the distress everywhere prevailing will find their expectations, like the apples of Sodom, turn to ashes in their hands.

Mr. Speaker, the evils under which we now suffer are too deep-seated to yield to such remedies. Their origin dates back to the years of civil war, when brother was arrayed against brother and the fairest portions of the land were drenched with human blood and gore. The losses and wastes of that terrible war were great beyond the power of conception, counting up to billions of dollars; expenditures represented to-day by a huge national debt of over $2,000,000,000, waste of person and of life faintly reflected in a pension-roll calling for the payment of thirty millions annually, and a destruction of property which no man can estimate. War is destruction, the destroying of life and of property, and in proportion to its desolating effects are the evils resultant therefrom. Therefore, no matter how perfect our financial legislation might have been, even though it should have been the production of absolute wisdom itself, sooner or later we should have been compelled to pay the penalties which every war exacts and practically realize that "as we sowed so should we reap." We must repair the wastes, we must make good the losses sustained before we can hope for any permanent prosperity. The individual whose farm is desolated by the destroying tempest or whose store-house is reduced to ashes by the fire fiend knows that he must recreate his wealth by resorting to the necessary means before he can hope for his former prosperity, and the man stricken with the fever knows that after the disease has left him he must recuperate his wasted system before the glow of health shall mantle his pallid cheek or the elasticity and strength of youth shall return to his tottering legs.

Sir, we should have husbanded our resources, economized in our national expenditures, denied ourselves the luxuries of life, developed our natural resources, opened up new avenues of industry so that labor would be well and profitably employed, and invited the workingmen of other lands to come over and help us in our great undertaking.

We did not act thus wisely. Instead of fully realizing, we shut our eyes to our true condition. We went upon the presumption that we were most prosperous and that our resources were inexhaustible. We fairly reveled in our folly and rejoiced in our apparent great prosperity. Without consideration we refused to employ our own workingmen, but went abroad and purchased of the productions of foreign industry enormous quantities. Why, sir, during the thirteen years ending June 30, 1876, we expended the large sum of $5,743,255,271 for foreign productions, while we only sold during the same period of the productions of our plantations and farms, mostly unmanufactured, the sum of $4,809,301,732, leaving us in debt in the sum of $933,953,539 to foreign producers and manufacturers, or seventy millions annually over and above all our sales.

To pay this large indebtedness we have taken all the precious metals dug from our mines and millions upon millions of national, State, and other bonds, to pay the interest upon which requires the annual exportations of many millions of dollars.

The nation, like the individual, which buys more than it sells must in the end become impoverished; and it is only a question of time, dependent upon the ability of that nation to stand this constant drain upon its internal resources. Now, sir, had we suffered none of the losses of the great war, sooner or later the crash would have come upon us, because we were exhausting ourselves by our excessive importations, and must at some time have arrived at that point when we could go on in that course no longer. Then comes the paralysis of business, with its attendant evils.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE.

I am aware, sir, that ill-advised persons talk with great affectation of learning about the balance of trade and very confidently assert that, inasmuch as trade seems the most to flourish when our importations largely exceed our exportations, business must then be in the most healthy condition. So the individual in any community whose expenditures exceed his income may seem to the unreflecting person to be greatly prospering, but he soon runs his race, and the goal he reaches is bankruptcy and ruin.

Now, sir, it seems to me self-evident that if we would be rich and prosperous as a nation we must sell more than we buy; we must keep the balance of trade in our favor, so that, instead of exporting the precious metals dug from our mines to pay for the excess of importations, the gold and silver of the world will flow in upon us to pay us for our excess of exportations. This exchangeable wealth of the nation is the representative of its real prosperity, and in proportion as we possess it in similar proportion do our industrial and other business enterprises flourish. The fixed or real property of a people has but little effect upon prices and consequently upon the life of trade; it is money which is master, and, as it is plenty or scarce, so are prices high or low, business active or dull. It should then be our aim, as a wise and thrifty people, to so manage our business interests that the balance of trade shall always be on the right side, and when from any untoward causes, our sales—our exportations—shall decline, we should limit our purchases to a corresponding extent.

The important question naturally suggests itself at this point, how can we increase our exportations or diminish our importations so as to add to our wealth and accumulations as a nation and as individuals? I answer by producing here, at home, and by the labor of American workingmen, every article necessary for our comfort and well-being, which the natural resources of the country or its climatic conditions will justify us in producing, thus rendering us, so far as possible independent of every other people.

Our land furnishes the raw material that enters into most articles of manufacture; we have the skill and intelligence necessary for the full utilization of that material, and in labor-saving machinery no nation in the world excels, if indeed any equals us, consequently we have all the necessary conditions of prosperity and wealth. Now, then, a further pertinent inquiry is, "What policy is necessary to the establishment of such manufactories as shall put in valuable and useful forms the raw material which we have in such variety and abundance?"

BRITAIN'S EXAMPLE.

We can do no better than to turn our attention to our great rival in all the arts of peace, Great Britain, formerly the most protectionist of all countries, now the patronizing advocate of free trade in America and of the world. If we fail to learn wisdom from her experience the fault will be our own. "England once pursued the barborous policy her free-traders now commend to us." This was particularly the case from the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries, when her people were mostly agricultural and obtained their supplies of articles of use and wear from the continent of Europe. Through the enterprise of merchants of other countries agricultural products were exported and manufactures were imported in foreign vessels. "Even iron was imported for the use of English blacksmiths."

McPherson in his Annals of Commerce states that in the fourteenth century England imported none of the raw material for manufactures which are so largely imported into Great Britain to-day, while her exports consisted of the most valuable of her raw materials, and of cloths in an unfinished state which may also be classed among raw materials.

In the fifteenth century a commercial writer complained that "the foreigners bear the gold out of this land, and sucketh the thrift out of our hand as the wasp sucketh honey out of the bee." It was also stated that all the world was clothed in English wool wrought by Flemish weavers. The wool was exported, manufactured, and sold back to England with a profit. And it was this condition of affairs that gave rise to the proverb: "The stranger buys of the Englishman the fox's skin for a groat and sells him the tail for a shilling."

While England was limiting her energies to agriculture and the exportation of her raw products the Flemish towns were becoming wealthy, populous, and powerful by their manufactures. So poor were her people that "among the upper classes the cloak, robe, or gown of the day was the coverlet of the night." The houses of the working people were miserable hovels. "There were very few houses, even in capital towns, which had chimneys; the fire was laid in the wall, and the smoke issued out of the roof or window. The people slept on straw pallets with a log of wood for a pillow." The population but little more than doubled in a period of five hundred years ending with the sixteenth century.

ENGLISH INDUSTRIES DEVELOPED BY PROTECTION.

As early as the reign of Edward III, we learn from Blackstone, "Much was done for establishing manufactures, by prohibiting the exportation of English wool, and the importation or wear of foreign cloths or furs, and by encouraging cloth-workers from other countries to settle there." This policy was continued, faintly foreshadowing protection, until Queen Elizabeth came to the throne. "She being an ardent friend to this policy, gave such encouragement, that there was a vast development of the manufacturing and commercial interests of the kingdom." Then, for the first time, England began to manifest the possession of those wonderful capabilities which have made her the first manufacturing and commercial nation of modern times. She also stimulated the building of ships by differential duties, and so created a great English navy. She encouraged the Huguenots of France, driven from that country by religious intolerance, to settle in England, and by prohibiting the importations of silks, built up that vast manufacturing interest which continued to flourish to the year 1860, when the protective duties levied upon imported silks were removed. Since then the business has been very much depressed. The workers find themselves with a small trade on the verge of starvation, and are once again looking to protective duties as their one means of relief.

Since the days of Queen Elizabeth, England's statesmen have well understood that her continued prosperity depends mainly upon her commerce, and commerce must be sustained by manufacturing, consequently everything has been done in the way of legislation to encourage and extend manufacturing, and the result has been a national prosperity never excelled. It was only after her manufactories had become permanently established and when protection was no longer required, because manufacturing had assumed such immense proportions that foreign markets were required for the larger part of the products of her looms, mills, furnaces, and workshops, that she abandoned her protective policy.

To-day Great Britain has an accumulation of capital which makes her proportionately the richest nation of the world. Money to carry on her vast industrial enterprises is most abundant at low rates of interest. She has a laboring population and a labor-saving machinery with the ability to manufacture manifold more than her entire population require; consequently to keep her people employed she is compelled to find markets in all parts of the earth. The results of a decline in foreign demand, or of her exclusion from a large market such as the United States, is most disastrously felt by her people. Referring to the coal trade the London Times of December 27, 1877, says:

> This paralysis of the chief industry of South Wales has already produced widespread disasters, exceeding in intensity and rivaling in extent the misery among the colliers and iron-workers after the strike of 1875. At Cardiff the work-house is thronged, the board-room and offices have been converted into dormitories; a supplemental stone-yard has been opened for the employment of married men, and the applications for admission are increasing at the rate of fifty a week. Poverty in its most degrading forms prevails among a population which not long ago was well paid and comfortable. The other day a family of seven persons were found to have subsisted for days on a pailful of brewer's "grain" intended for feeding pigs, others have fed on potato peelings. Men have gone to work from day to day on a dish of raw cabbage-leaves.

In reference to the iron trade it says:

> The economical history of 1877 in this branch of trade is most discouraging. The fall of prices has been gradual and general, and is too considerable to be accounted for by reductions in the cost of production, as in the price of coal and ironstone and in the wages of furnacemen. * * * The consequence is that the producers of crude iron must, in self-defense, limit the output, and this cannot be accomplished without inflicting many hardships upon a large industrial population.

A telegram from London of January 22 says:

> The arbitrators of the wages question in South Staffordshire have decided that wages be reduced 7½ per cent.

Another of the date of March 12 announces that—

> The Coal-Owners' Association of North Yorkshire and South Derbyshire have determined to reduce miners' wages 7½ per cent. The men would probably consent to a reduction of 5 per cent., but it is thought likely that they will resist a decrease of 7½ per cent. This resolution of the Coal-Owners' Association affects from twenty-five to thirty thousand miners. Manufacturers in the north of England iron trade also propose to reduce the wages of their work people from 10 to 17 per cent. From the preparations the men are making it is believed that they intend to organize general resistance.

And still later dispatches state that the reduction of wages is still going on in every branch of industry.

In view of the condition of all her industrial enterprises the statesmen of Great Britain are not unreasonably anxious to persuade us that "free trade with all the markets of the world is the true theory of government."

FREE TRADE IN IRELAND.

The effect of the practical operation of this theory upon the industries of a nation is well exhibited in the case of Ireland. At one time she had flourishing manufactures which gave employment to a large and contented people. England forced upon her by hostile legislation the abandonment of these industries and the substitution of English goods of use and wear. Says Judge Byles:

> Before the union there were, under protection, Irish woolen manufactures, Irish cotton manufactures, Irish blanket manufactures, Irish calico manufactures, Irish flannel manufactures. These manufactories are now smothered and extinct.

The act of union abolished protective duties and English free trade destroyed these manufactures beyond all hope of recovery. Thus large numbers of the Irish people were thrown out of employment, and, going from bad to worse, their miseries culminated in a terrible famine, from the direful effects of which, and from emigration, induced by want of employment, the population of the Emerald Isle decreased from 8,199,153 in 1841 to 5,402,759 in 1871. Probably no civilized people have ever suffered as have the Irish, and it is not at all wonderful that they hate their English oppressors with a hatred perfect in its character and beyond description.

That I am not in error in ascribing the present condition of Ireland to English free trade, I quote from a speech lately delivered by Major O'Gorman, a member of Parliament from Waterford, Ireland:

> What has free trade done for Ireland? I will tell you. It has turned all our red ground into grass from which to rear cattle to feed the accursed English fellows who have trampled upon Ireland, and who would even do it now but with the help of God we will not let them. What has free trade done more than this? I will tell you. It has turned the poor of our country into these horrible, miserable houses. The poor have been driven into the work-houses because there is nothing to be seen but grass—a state of things which has been brought about by the laws of the infernal country which governs us, laws which if carried out would allow our poor Irish people being thrown after death into a hole just as you would throw a dog into a ditch. But I say, if you as Irishmen countenance such a thing it will not be natural—it will not be Irish.

Making proper allowance for Irish rhetoric and for Irish hate and still the picture drawn by the major is distressing to the last degree.

Continental countries which have tended of late years toward free trade are again looking to protection as a relief for their depressed and oppressed industries. So that we of all nations are the only one proposing to take a step backward in this respect.

ENGLAND'S AIM.

To build up and extend her already world-wide commerce and find markets for her manufactures has been for many years past, and still is, the great object of England's statesmen, and they pursue it with a sagacity and pertinacity truly marvelous and worthy of all admiration. In this respect we would do well to imitate them. They have ever made it one of the cardinal principles of her colonial policy to discourage manufacturing and make the colonies tributary to the mother country, as they did with our forefathers prior to the revolutionary war. Wiser than ourselves, she fosters her commerce by encouraging the establishment of steamship lines with all the nations of the world, and thereby makes them tributary to her. She gives her enterprising capitalists every encouragement to enter into commercial ventures with a view of finding markets for her immense productions. Consequently every sea is dotted with English vessels, and the union jack is seen flying from the mast-heads of more ships than the flags of all other nations combined.

I am aware, sir, that free-traders ascribe her great superiority over ourselves in this respect to our protective policy, and we are gravely informed if we would only liberalize our laws so as to permit our merchants to employ British workingmen in British ship-yards to build our steamers and other vessels for us, in a trice we would become the rivals of Great Britain in the number of our ships and in the magnitude and importance of commercial enterprises. This claim is wholly untenable, for the large subsidies paid by the British government give her ship-owners such an advantage that they can crush out every rival, and in addition thereto the smaller salaries and wages paid their seamen give them another great advantage over us which would make almost every venture upon our part a disastrous failure. Then, again, ship-building in this country would be suspended until wages were reduced as low here as elsewhere, and the silence of death would reign in every ship-yard. Why, sir, a few years ago ship-building was extensively carried on upon the river Thames, but the superior facilities afforded by the Clyde has transferred that business to its banks, and to-day it is the great ship-yard of Great Britain.

I grant that American enterprise and American ingenuity can accomplish wonders, but until they can induce our shipwrights to labor for substantially the same wages paid by ship-builders upon the Clyde it will be idle to imagine we can successfully compete with them, even if we could purchase every article which forms part of the vessel at as moderate prices as they do. Before leaving this subject I will state a fact which may not be known to all: it is that the steamer which costs $500,000 when completed contains only $5,000 of raw material, the remaining $495,000 being the cost of labor which enters into the manufacture of materials used or in the putting of them together in the ship. That large sum represents the labor of American workingmen, which it is proposed to deprive them of because foreign workingmen will toil at lower wages. Well may our people pray to be delivered from such friends.

Mr. Speaker, I have said more about British principles and policy and practice in this regard than I should have done but for the fact that Great Britain is held up to us by admiring free-traders as an example for us to follow, notwithstanding the relative difference of the two nations in riches, territory, and population. As long as protection served to promote British interests and enhance British power, she adopted it as her policy; when, by reason of the changed condition and circumstances of her people, it became necessary to find foreign markets for her enormous productions, she became the zealous advocate of free trade; and that she may control our markets and do our work for us, she uses every artifice to induce us to follow in her footsteps. British policy is succinctly set forth by the Marquis of Salisbury in a speech he recently made in Parliament. He said: "The government has done all in its power to secure peace and good government for the Christians in Turkey, but would not do anything to imperil British subjects or their interests for the sake of all the Christians in the world." We have seen Great Britain stand idly by while the Russian conquered the Turk, offering no active assistance to her ancient ally, while to-day she is most actively engaged in making every preparation for war with Russia because she deems British interests imperiled. And as she would maintain her interests in the Levant by bloody war, so will she maintain her commercial and industrial supremacy in the West by artfully persuading us that her policy is our best interest. I regret to say she has many advocates whom she has in a variety of ways induced to champion her policy.

UNITED STATES.

Sir, there is no nation upon the face of the earth which has so many of the elements of national greatness as the United States. With the great extent of territory reaching from the frigid zone of the north to the tropics of the south, extending from the shores of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific, with every variety of climate and soil known to man, enabling us to produce every article of diet, use, and wear known to the civilized world, there is no substantial reason why we should not have an industrial future the most brilliant the world has ever witnessed. All that is necessary is the adoption of such a permanent policy upon our part as shall at all times develop in our people their maximum power of production; and we are only wise and statesman-like while we keep this object constantly in view. Therefore, if protective tariffs will best accomplish this we should keep them upon our statute-books, and when the time arrives that a free-trade policy will best subserve our ends we should adopt free trade. This is a mere matter of policy, not principle. Now, then, experience teaches us that established manufactures, supported by large capital, have always been able to prevent the establishment of new manufactures unless the latter were in some way protected. Accordingly old countries, possessed of cheap labor, cheap money, and low taxes, have such advantages over new countries that without discriminating legislation manufacturing cannot be successfully established in the latter.

The foundation of all wealth is labor, and however rich a country may be in natural resources it will not become wealthy if it does not manufacture its raw material, for the great value of the manufactures is the labor concentrated in them, and the least skilled and lowest priced labor is that employed in securing raw material. "The wealthiest cities and countries, from the earliest periods to the present, were the manufacturing cities and countries."

Another advantage derived from manufacturing is that it brings together dense populations, thus furnishing a market for the products of agriculture which would otherwise have to seek foreign markets at a loss of the transportation and without the advantages of competition. Our farmers who reside near manufacturing centers fully understand the great advantages they enjoy over their brother agriculturists who are less fortunately located, and the value of their farms is correspondingly enhanced.

PROTECTION OUR TRUE POLICY.

The only question, then, necessary for us to consider is what policy is necessary to enable our people to develop this maximum power of production and how shall the raw material we have in such variety and abundance be put into such shape as will render it the most valuable and the best adapted to supply the wants of mankind. Now, I concede that in labor-saving machinery and "in cheap and effective processes of manufacture we can rival the world." But in labor and capital we cannot compete, for labor is far better compensated in this country than in Europe, and the rates of interest are upon an average at least double what they are in older countries. We must pay higher wages, because our people must be educated to fit them for an intelligent discharge of their duties as American citizens. "Our theory of civilization is higher than that of Europe." Here, the people are the masters and administer for their own benefit the affairs of state. In other countries they are but "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for their ruling classes. The intelligence of the people is with them a minor consideration.

The great item of cost in all manufactured goods not protected by patents is labor. Cheap goods, therefore, imply cheap labor. The lower the wages the cheaper the products of labor can be sold, and without cheap labor we cannot have cheap goods. What do low wages mean to the workingman? Subsistence for himself and family merely. The necessaries of life only, with none of its luxuries. Hard, never-ending toil, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. The placing of his children at work in their tender years to dwarf their bodies and benumb their intellects. It means ignorance, degradation of all that is divine in human nature, with no hope for the future. Life is to him a vast sand desert, upon which there appear no bright oases to greet his eye or to make glad his heart.

Revolting as this description is to the heart and conscience of every humanitarian, it justly pictures the condition of the laboring-man and his family in Europe. When our workingmen are brought to this condition how many burning tears will be poured out like rain, how many bright hopes go out in the darkness of an everlasting night!

CONDITION OF LABOR.

It is not pleasant to contemplate the situation of labor in this country at the present time. The wages paid are very low and are wholly inadequate to place the laborer in circumstances at all approaching comfort for himself and family. The future can only be regarded with apprehension and dismay. Times seem to be sadly out of joint, for not only is labor cheap, but it is begging employment by capital with but poor success. The cry of "hard times" is heard all over the land, and millions of outstretched hands are begging us for relief. In order to legislate intelligently we must understand what "hard times" signify. It means that money is scarce and labor plenty. It means that money is dear and labor cheap. It means there is a forced economy all over the land; that there are more sellers than buyers, and is a necessary corollary that prices are constantly declining. Now, a declining market is always a dull market, for there is no confidence and purchases are made only to supply immediate wants. Why, sir, the forced economy of the past four years has destroyed a home market almost, if not quite, equal to our entire foreign exportation, certainly to not less than $450,000,000 a year. In other words, we have consumed at home $450,000,000 less of the products of our factories, mills, workshops, and farms each year since 1873 than we did for several years prior thereto. This of itself, without other causes, would produce a paralysis of trade, a stagnation of business, hard times.

But for this forced economy we would have expended the four hundred and fifty millions annually as formerly. This would have given employment to not less than one million laborers at average wages of $1.50 a day and supported not less than five millions of people. There would have been no begging for work, no such destitution as we have all witnessed, no great army of tramps to annoy and terrify. Expenditure is not always extravagance, nor is economy always a virtue.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I have already stated the extraordinary character of our importations for a series of years past, amounting to over $5,743,255,000. A large part of these importations consisted of articles which we do not produce at home, and which we were therefore compelled to purchase abroad or do without; but a very considerable portion consisted of iron goods, woolens, silks, cotton goods, and other articles that we might just as well have made at home if we had only been wise enough to do so. By so doing, two important objects would have been accomplished: first, we would have given employment to a vast army of workingmen at remunerative wages, and secondly, we would have kept at home a large sum of money that we sent abroad. We did not do it. We preferred to hire foreign laborers to work for us, because the circumstances under which they were placed compelled them to work cheaper than our own workingmen would labor, and thereby deprived ourselves of the markets which this large sum, paid out in our midst, would have provided for the products of our garden and fields in the maintenance of this numerous body of laborers and their families.

BUY-CHEAP PRINCIPLE.

In this country the only principle of political economy that the great mass of our people seem to be at all familiar with is the "buy-cheap principle," and each individual looks upon it as an especial hardship if he is not permitted to buy where he can buy the cheapest and to sell where he can sell the dearest, irrespective of the paramount rights and interests of the nation at large. Now, there is no principle more vicious to the individual himself nor more ruinous to the country, as a moment's reflection will convince any intelligent man; for it means simply the purchasing of all articles where they can be bought the cheapest. It means the employment of the laborers and workshops of other countries to the exclusion of our own. It means the monopolizing of our home markets by foreign workingmen, and the sending abroad of our raw material to be converted by labor into the articles of use and wear necessary for our comfort and well-being. And finally, it means the impoverishment of ourselves as a nation, and of our becoming a mere tributary to the country which we employ to do our work. Under such circumstances it would be impossible for us to attain to the truest and most lasting national prosperity—that prosperity which is acquired and retained by a permanent development and employment of all our natural resources, aided by the united skill, industry, and enterprise of our people. The fancied rights of the individual must be sacrificed to the public welfare, and he cannot be permitted to buy where he can buy the cheapest if injury is done to the nation. The country at large is not interested in the question of prices between the producer and the consumer. The money paid is simply transferred from the pocket of the buyer to that of the seller, and remaining in the country leaves it just as rich as before. But purchases made abroad transfer the prices paid, not only from the pockets of the producer to those of the consumer, but also from the shores of our own country to another, and to that extent deprives us of our wealth and makes us by that amount the poorer.

The farmer and planter purchase from the merchant, the merchant from the manufacturer, the manufacturer pays out the money he receives to the planter and farmer for the raw material he has used, and to the workingman for his labor employed in the process of manufacture; the laborer in turn spends his wages with the merchant and farmer for such articles of wear and food as may be required for himself and family, and the higher the wages he receives the more generous his expenditures. Thus the money is retained in the country, and it is of no manner of importance to the community at large what the prices may be; that concerns only the parties immediately interested. In fact, the higher the wages paid, and consequently the prices of manufactures, the more active is business and the greater the apparent prosperity of the people. Then we talk about good times.

The healthiest and most desirable condition of business is when the workingman is receiving a fair price for his labor and the capitalist such returns on his investment as will encourage him to continue his business and extend the same as the demand may justify.

On the other hand, if the merchant purchases of the importer the money goes abroad, foreign laborers are employed, our own workingmen remain idle, the country is stripped of its wealth, the people become impoverished, they have nothing to buy with, trade becomes stagnant, business paralyzed, and the era of hard times and low prices is inaugurated, from which we only emerge by self-denial, suffering, and distress such as we are now experiencing. Let me illustrate. If we were to take all the representatives of wealth—the greenbacks, bank-notes, bonds, and mortgages—of the country, and make a huge bonfire of them we would not diminish the real wealth of the country, because we would destroy nothing which possessed any intrinsic value. We would make the Government, the banks, and the obligors of the bonds and mortgages richer and the owners of the same poorer to the extent of the value of these representatives of wealth; but if we destroy property which is produced by labor, and is therefore wealth itself, we make the country poorer to the extent of the intrinsic value of the property destroyed. Purchasing the productions of foreign labor is almost the equivalent in its evil effects to the destruction of property itself.

PRESENT TARIFF—IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. Speaker, the present customs tariff is often denounced as prohibitory in its character and destructive of the commerce of the country. Is it subject to this charge?

In 1860 our imports exceeded those of any previous year, amounting to	$362,189,270
Our exports were, domestic	373,189,274
Of which were coin and bullion	56,946,857
Our foreign exports	26,933,022
Total exports	457,069,147
In 1870 we imported, merchandise	435,958,408
Coin and bullion	26,419,179
Exports, domestic	420,500,275
Foreign	16,155,295
Coin and bullion, foreign	14,271,864
Coin and bullion, domestic	43,893,802
In 1876, imports, merchandise	460,761,190
Coin and bullion	15,936,081
Exports, domestic	536,089,810
Exports, foreign	14,802,424
Coin and bullion, foreign	6,467,611
Coin and bullion, domestic	50,038,691

The values expressed are specie values.

In 1877 the exports considerably exceeded those of any other year, and the imports were nearly as large in value. So it will be perceived that our commerce is to-day greater than ever before; and if we do not do the carrying it is for reasons that can be better given by others more familiar with the shipping interest than I am. I feel assured, however, that the reason cannot be found in our tariff regulations.

No nation has made as great advances in these respects; so that it appears that while the tariff is eminently protective in its character and has developed our native industries to an extent unparalleled in the history of the country our commerce has also grown more rapidly proportionately than at any previous period in our national existence. Now, of the five hundred and eighty-six millions of foreign merchandise we have consumed the past year, if we had employed American workingmen to have produced, say, one-half or three hundred millions, what would have been the result? We would have imported coin or Government bonds for the excess of exports over imports and would have paid that sum as wages to American laborers, skilled and unskilled, and so have given employment to about one million workingmen who have been idle because no man would employ them. The cry for bread would not have been heard, and want and wretchedness, like blight and mildew, would not, as they do now, cover the land.

DUTIES FOR PROTECTION.

Mr. Speaker, with me the question of revenue is a secondary consideration, for I believe in protective duties for the sake of protecting our labor against the competition of pauper labor in Europe. I would levy duties for the direct object of protecting our various industries. I would preserve the home markets to American workingmen, and so far as they may not have the skill and ability to produce what may be required, I would invite the skilled workingmen of other countries to become residents of our own instead of going abroad and purchasing the productions of other countries.

With the experiences of the past before him no intelligent person whose judgment is not warped by self-interest can come to any other conclusion than that it is better for us, by discriminating legislation, to invite workingmen here to produce what we may require rather than for our consumers to go to them, and in that way diversify, build up, and extend all our industries, manufacturing and otherwise. How utterly have the theories of free-traders broken down and their prophecies failed of realization in the light of experience. Dr. Wayland, author of a work on political economy which at one time was read as a text-book in our schools and colleges, in advocating the theory of free trade said: "We pay a heavy duty on cutlery in this country, while not a thousandth part of the cutlery used is made here. It would be vastly cheaper to pay a bounty sufficient to raise all the cutlery made in this country to its present price, and it would be, for aught I see, as good for the cutler." When penning that paragraph little did he think that before a generation should pass off the stage of action one establishment alone in this country, the direct result of protection, would manufacture more cutlery than we then used, and at prices such as the importer cannot compete with. I refer to the one my esteemed friend the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LANDERS] is interested in, which has the capacity for manufacturing daily two hundred and twenty-five gross of table-cutlery alone, at prices varying from $5.50 per gross and upward. And again, as late as 1872, another theorist, Mr. Atkinson, of Boston, before a committee of Congress remarked: "Other nations buy their goods of England, and we may as well do it, too, and not enrich a set of monopolists and a few men who live at the expense of others. It were better for us to pension off every man now engaged in the manufacture of steel than to impose the duties we now do on that article." To-day, sir, manufacturers in my district can furnish Mr. LANDERS and others the best of steel at prices lower than England ever charged them, and at such rates as were not dreamed of a few years ago. The same may be said of all kinds and qualities of iron manufactures, including every description of cut-nails.

MANUFACTURERS NOT MONOPOLISTS.

It was the fashion among free-traders a few years ago to denounce manufacturers as monopolists who deserved the execration of the community. It was charged that a protective tariff benefited no one but the owners of manufacturing establishments; that the price of a commodity was enhanced to the full extent of the duty charged, all of which went into the pockets of the capitalists; and that the workingmen were the victims of this grasping policy. We have not heard much of that sort of talk of late years; the logic of events has silenced these calumniators, for it has conclusively proved that the theory of the protectionist is correct, namely, that home competition alone would bring down the price of all manufactures to as low a point as the wages paid the workingmen would justify; and in fact to-day, as I have already stated, wages throughout the manufacturing portions of the United States are too low for the comfort and well-being of the operative and artisan, while it is equally true that the capital invested is not only making no return but is melting away under the influence of home competition alone like snow before the burning sun.

IRON INDUSTRY.

The benefits our industrial enterprises derive from protective legislation are fully shown in the experiences of the past fifteen years. A republican Congress, whether from a genuine belief in the principles of the policy or because the exigencies of the Government demanded it, enacted a tariff which was eminently protective in its character, and which, somewhat modified, is the law of the land to-day. I shall call your attention to its influences upon one only of the leading industries of the country, of which I have a personal knowledge and can therefore speak with confidence. I refer to iron. The total number of tons produced in the United States for the years mentioned are as follows:

Year.	Tons.	Years.	Tons.
1830	165,000	1866	1,350,343
1840	315,000	1868	1,603,000
1850	564,755	1870	1,865,000
1854	736,218	1871	2,858,558
1856	883,137	1873	2,868,278
1858	705,094	1874	2,689,413

The furnace capacity in this country exceeds five million tons per annum, while the consumption demand has never exceeded three million tons and is not generally more than two million to two million five hundred thousand tons, so that for years to come, if no more iron furnaces are erected, those we have will be able to produce far more iron than it is possible to consume. Although our industries may revive and an active demand for iron goods of every description spring up, there is then no likelihood that prices will for a series of years appreciate so as to afford even a moderate return for the capital invested, together with fair wages to the persons employed.

WHY CHANGE THE TARIFF?

Mr. Speaker, what is the object of changing the tariff in any material respect? Is it that it may be made more of a revenue tariff in its character? Such seems to have been the intention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, since he so drafted his bill as to greatly cripple if not effectually destroy the leading manufacturing industries of the country. Is it desirable that our immense imports should be increased and the country still further depleted of its wealth? Are gentlemen of opinion that it is better for us to employ the workingmen of other countries to perform our labor while our own workingmen stand idle all the day?

Does he think it better for us to purchase our iron goods and manufactures of steel in England and Belgium, and thereby suffer the rolling-mills and founderies and machine-shops of the United States to remain with unlighted fires and untenanted walls while the operatives of those establishments seek employment in other avocations perhaps already overstocked with laborers? or is he of opinion that the wages now paid are too high and should be brought down to a level with those paid in Europe? Is there any gentleman upon this floor who wishes to see the free and intelligent workingman of America compelled to compete with the cheaper and pauper labor of Europe? If not, why then desire to see the duties upon manufactures reduced, when it is as evident as that the sun shines at noonday that prices are already so low that the capitalist receives no return and the laborer is very inadequately compensated? Why does he want to take any portion of the home market from our own people, when it is confessed that there is not employment for all? Does he desire still further to degrade labor in this country? Sir, the person who proposes or advocates measures of such a tendency is the enemy—unwittingly, perhaps, but none the less the enemy—of the workingman of our country.

Sir, no changes should be made unless we are well advised that they are in the interests of labor. "Our aim should be to establish a national tariff policy which shall be regarded as permanent, and so to frame its provisions as to promote the use and development of our vast national resources and to secure, as far as depends on legislation, the highest attainable prosperity of all sections of the country." If we do this, our industries will become diversified, new avenues to labor will be opened up, consumers will make their purchases of domestic producers, the busy hum of industry will be heard all over the land, and the fires of our now silent furnaces, rolling-mills, and founderies will be lighted up, making the very heavens lurid with their flames.

BESSEMER STEEL.

Mr. Speaker, before closing I desire to call the attention of the House to some other branches of the iron business, that it may be clearly seen how they have grown under the fostering care of protective legislation and what effect such legislation has had upon prices.

Up to 1867 there had been no Bessemer steel produced in this country. The price then charged was $150 per ton in gold (equal then to $225 currency) for steel rails. As American works were built the price of the foreign article was gradually lowered. The duty was fixed at $28 in gold, and to-day Bessemer steel of the best quality can be bought at American mills at $40 in currency while the importation of the foreign article has entirely ceased. Since 1867 the production has been as follows in net tons.

Year.	Tons.	Year.	Tons.
1871	38,250	1876	412,461

It is to-day a leading branch of the iron industry of the country, consuming annually nearly one-fourth of the total pig-iron product, and although foreign competition ceased more than a year ago the price from the influences of home competition alone has declined within the past two years $20 per ton. Importations were as follows:

	Net tons.

During these years the prices have fluctuated as follows:

CUT NAILS.

Again, the manufacture of cut nails, which is purely an American invention, shows in the most signal manner the benefits of protection. The total production in 1876 was 4,157,814 kegs of one hundred pounds each, and the price to-day is but little, if any, over 2 cents per pound, while the duty is 1½ cents per pound. Here again home competition has reduced the price so low that operators are not paid fair wages, while the manufacturer is receiving no return whatever upon his investment.

SAWS, ETC.

Take again the article of saws. Up to 1840 none were made here and we were compelled to pay whatever foreigners chose to charge us for them. In that year Henry Disston commenced the manufacture in Philadelphia in a small way. English saws then sold at prices ranging from $15.75 to $19 a dozen. Since 1876 Henry Disston & Son have been sending saws to England, warranted equal to the best saws made in that country, and selling them at $10.50 per dozen, and they are shipping common saws to South America at $4.50 per dozen. But for protection they never would have been in a position to compete successfully with foreign makers in this country, much less could they have found a market in other lands for $100,000 annually of their products.

I might go through all the different branches of iron industries and make quite as marked and distinct showing, but time will not suffice. The examples I have given abundantly show the fallacy of the theory of free-traders "that the duty is always added to the price."

HOW WORKINGMEN VIEW THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

Mr. Speaker, you have doubtless noted with what apprehension and alarm the news is received in all places where iron industries are carried on that this Congress is proposing to make radical changes in the present tariff and to materially reduce the duty upon iron and steel manufactures in their various branches. More particularly are the operatives at our furnaces, rolling-mills, founderies, and machine-shops aroused to a sense of impending danger, for they have learned that they cannot receive fair wages for a full day's work if the labor of other countries is to be brought into competition with their own. They see all the proposed changes fraught with nothing but evil to themselves and their families, for the experiences of the past few years have taught them that a dullness of market is attended with a decline in prices and that a decline in prices means a cutting down of their wages, for necessity compels them to labor at such wages as they may be able to obtain and as the business will justify. Wages are always the first element in production to feel the effects of a decline in prices, because they are always within the control of the employer, while interest and taxes are not. Consequently, when a reduction is necessary, in order that a business may be continued without loss, the laborer suffers that reduction. Well may they then take the alarm when they behold the representatives of the people ruthlessly putting the knife to the various industries which in these times of depression pay such wages only as barely to enable them to furnish their families with the merest necessities of life. And it would be well for us to heed their remonstrances, when it is sufficiently evident that the only persons to be benefited by these proposed changes are the importer and the foreign manufacturer.

I am aware, sir, that it is claimed our manufactures are so securely established that protection is no longer necessary. This is stated only by impracticable theorists or such persons as are willing to see wages reduced so low that we will, in this respect, be on a par with European countries. But he who has the good of the laboring-man at heart, who rejoices in the prosperity and well-being of all classes of our people, and who desires to see our country great in productive power and self-dependent strength can entertain no such opinion.

PROTECTION NECESSARY.

Upon the necessity and propriety of protection I desire to give the opinion of that able industrial paper the London Engineer. In a late number it says:

If we turn to America as a country which is self-sufficing as regards the necessities of life, we shall see that protection may really be a very excellent policy. Let us take for example, the iron trade. If America elected to remain an agricultural country, and purchased the luxuries of life by selling the corn and cotton and meat she could not consume, then it would be folly to protect the iron manufacturers of the United States; and it is possible that corn-growing America could import rails, let us say, from iron-producing England cheaper than she could make them herself. But the moment America decided that she would not rest content with growing corn, and cotton, and beef, but that she would make iron as well, then her Government acted wisely in protecting that manufacture. If it were not protected it would not grow at all. They could not have an iron trade without protection. That is admitted on all hands, except by a few political economists whose opinions are more remarkable for their dogmatism than their soundness.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, it appears to me self-evident that, "if we are to be a better-educated, better-fed, and better-clothed people than those of other nations, we must be better employed. To be better employed, we must be protected from the competition of the cheap labor, cheap capital, and low taxes of those rival countries." Protection of our industries is right as a principle, and absolutely necessary as a policy if we desire prosperity within our borders. If we had been compelled to manufacture all that we consumed we would have escaped in great part the financial evils and business distress which have afflicted us so sorely for a few years past, and would be a stronger, wiser, richer, and more prosperous people than we now are. Let us wisely heed the experiences of the past and by our legislation at least give every encouragement to American industry in all its branches by providing ample and complete protection.

INVESTIGATION OF THE ELECTORAL FRAUDS.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the few words which I have to say at this time I will speak not as a partisan, but as a citizen, and shall address myself mainly to the question what is the duty of Congress at this time touching the bill or the subject-matter of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, reserving for some other occasion the questions of fact and of law involved in its future consideration. The question now to be considered is: Shall Congress by the enactment of the necessary law give to the Supreme Court the power and authority to hear and investigate the alleged frauds of the election of 1876, and upon such hearing and investigation to determine judicially and forever who were elected to the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term commencing March 4, 1877?

The great majority of the people of this country, without distinction or regard to party, desire to know whether a government which has asserted and maintained its power and authority among the na tions of the world for a century, which has emerged triumphant from the most gigantic civil war known to history, is now to have its fair fame and the national honor tarnished through the inability of the people or the people's Representatives to resist the insidious and seductive influences of power and patronage, or whether there is still left strength and courage sufficient to detect and punish fraud and crime though it may touch the highest officer under it. Can it be that the power of a great nation is to be exercised only upon its weaker citizens, and that when a crime has been committed against that nation's life it is powerless to protect itself? The honest men of business, the men of daily toil, deny it. They love their country, they love truth and justice, and they remember how much the founders of this Government sacrificed to secure the God-given right to select by ballot their own rulers; and many of them still remember the oppressions of foreign countries and what hardships they have endured in leaving the land of their birth to obtain a home in this free country, where they and their children might enjoy the blessings of liberty and the rights of men.

They point with commendable pride to the strength and power of the Government in maintaining its existence and honor when attacked by an armed foe, and they cannot now believe that Congress, the great representative body of the people, will longer sit as in a quiet sleep when from every quarter of this broad land comes the charge that fraud has triumphed and that virtue and honesty no longer have a dwelling-place in the national heart.

The right of the ballot is too sacred to be defeated by fraud and corruption. All party and political considerations sink into utter insignificance when compared with the right of the citizen to be protected in the exercise of the elective franchise; and sorry am I for that man who has not patriotism sufficient to rise above all party considerations when the honor of his country is in issue. If fraud has been committed and can succeed, and if the ballot can be disregarded in one election, what is to prevent a repetition of the crime? The history of other nations teaches that one by one, step by step, the liberties of the people have been encroached upon; that if not resisted and overcome at first approach, the distance between the people and their liberties soon becomes so great that it is a gulf impassable, and the liberties of that people are lost forever, unless restored through the terrible ordeal of revolution. God grant that this nation may have the courage to face the truth, and avert the danger before it be too late.

Sir, for one, and influenced solely by a sense of justice to the people and their rights, I am in favor of the most thorough and searching judicial examination and investigation that can be had. I care not what the result to individuals or political parties may be, provided we know the truth and justice triumphs. If fraud has been committed, let those who are guilty, whether high or low, rich or poor, be exposed and punished, and then let the beneficiary of the fraud likewise be exposed and punished. This investigation is due alike to each of the gentlemen who represented the two great political parties in the last presidential election. Both of them being honorable men, it cannot be presumed that either would wish or for a moment consent to hold an office to which he was not honestly elected, and certainly no honorable man, for the sake of holding office, would wish to go down to history with the dark cloud of fraud encircling his otherwise fair name. The present Executive, more than any other person in the country, is entitled to a full and fair judicial investigation of the whole matter. Justice to him strongly demands it; and should the result of that investigation establish that no fraud was committed in returning, counting, and declaring the electoral votes of the several States, then let it be so decided, so that the people may know and understand it; and let the evidence, the whole evidence upon which the decision is based go to the country, so that the politicians and all others will be compelled to stop this cry of fraud, and like men acknowledge they were wrong and that they have done an innocent man an injustice.

Can you, men of the republican party, afford to miss this precious opportunity to establish once and forever that you had no hand in any fraud or that there was no fraud in the election of President; or have you feasted and fattened so long upon the public patronage of the Government, that rather than take any chance of losing it you are content to forget your past history and surrender your honor and your manhood for place? You who are politicians may be willing, but the rank and file of your party never.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, subscribe to that policy which is often heard upon this side of the House, that it will be better for the democratic party to leave the whole matter as it now stands rather than press any further investigation; that the people now believe that a fraud has been committed and nothing can be gained or accomplished by giving the Supreme Court the power to investigate and decide the questions, and that as a matter of political policy it is unwise to go further. These gentlemen would cry "Fraud, fraud," and yet would do nothing to disclose and punish the wrong-doers. They are loud in their denunciations of the President, the republican party, and the electoral commission. Greater politicians than statesmen, I fear they govern or seek to govern their actions, not by the rule of right and wrong, but by the effect it will have on the votes of their districts and of the country. To these and such as these let me say that the people of this nation are fast becoming dissatisfied and disgusted with politicians; they are looking for men of principles, men who when they know the right dare maintain it let the political consequences be what they may; and they are demanding from the majority of this House such action as may be necessary to a full and fair investigation of all the alleged frauds in the election of 1876. Refuse their demand and their answer will be, "You are no longer worthy of confidence or support."

Again we often hear it said, "True, a fraud and wrong has been committed, but there is no remedy; we can do nothing." I for one do not believe in such doctrine. I remember that law is founded upon reason and justice, and that reason and justice abhor crime. True, wrong never rights itself, but if a fraud and crime have been committed, there is a way to demonstrate and reveal it, and if it is in our power, and we neglect or refuse to exercise that power, we not only fail in the duty which we owe to the people, but we ourselves become a party to the fraud. Our inaction or neglect to use every legal and honorable means in our power to discover the truth, reveal and punish fraud, makes us accessory to the fraud, and even more contemptible in the eyes of the world than those who committed it. We lack the courage to expose and punish what they had the courage to do. Already there is a wide-spread fear in the land that the people's Representatives in this matter as in too many others act not from their convictions but from political motives. Has the time not come when the general good of the country and the welfare and safety of our institutions should demand our most earnest and best efforts without regard to the consequences which may come to party? Ought we not to demand justice and thus restore confidence? Can we or should we escape censure if by our silence we aid in concealing the truth? You who admit the fraud and crime answer, if you can.

Another objection is urged against this bill or any other mode of investigation which, without consideration, suffices to satisfy a certain class of gentlemen who say it is better to suffer a wrong than to take the trouble to investigate and know the right. Briefly stated it is this: that notwithstanding a fraud may have been committed in the electoral count, yet we had better submit to it than to disturb, as they say, the business interests of the country. The people, it is urged, want quiet. True they want quiet, they want peace, but they want neither at the expense of their personal rights and liberties. I know the business men, and by business men I mean the mechanics and the men whose sweat and toil have built our railroads, our canals, and converted the broad acres of this country into fruitful fields, and whose labor is the great foundation of the nation's wealth and prosperity. And in their name I deny that they are willing now or ever to sanction fraud and crime for the sake of a fancied quiet. The law with all its vigor and severity is enforced upon the poor man when he violates it. Can there be any justification in not enforcing it upon others when they commit crime? I protest against any discrimination.

The history of this Government has always shown that the great masses of the people, the business and the laboring men, when the safety of the Government was in danger were ever true, awake, and ready to defend their rights, their liberties, the nation's honor, the laws and the Constitution of their fathers. They know full well, and far better than all the politicians on earth, the worth and value of a stable and secure government, but with the Government as with their business they cannot and will not suffer it to be even tainted with fraud. They demand equal and exact justice to all men; that crime committed in high places shall be exposed and punished with the same promptness as if committed by the humblest citizen. The argument that it were better to submit to fraud and wrong rather than disturb business interests or the quiet of the state would, if followed to its legitimate conclusions, justify the usurpation of the Government by its office-holders; it would deprive the people of the right of the ballot, for what would be the use of voting if the authorities in power can disregard the vote? But, fortunately, the method proposed will in no way disturb either business interests or the peace of the state. The law will quietly, but no less certainly and forever, I trust, determine who was elected President of the United States in the election of 1876.

The passage of this bill or one similar in its character is demanded by the honest men of this country. They have read and understand the facts; they know that to the candidate of the republican party was given the eight electoral votes of the State of Louisiana; they know that this same candidate after he took possession of the office of President, instead of recognizing Mr. Packard, the republican candidate for governor, as the legally elected governor of that State, and who confessedly received more votes than the republican presidential electors, recognized instead Governor Nicholls, the democratic candidate, who has since been governor of the State of Louisiana, and they believe by this act he impeached his own title. The people would like to know why, if the Hayes electors received a majority of the votes cast in Louisiana, and Mr. Packard received a still greater number of votes, how it was Mr. Packard was not recognized by the Government, and sustained in his office, if necessary, by the whole power of the Government.

The same state of affairs exists in two other States. In South Carolina, Hampton, the democratic candidate, is governor, but the seven electoral votes of that State were counted for Mr. Hayes. In Florida, Drew, the democratic candidate, is governor, but the four electoral votes of that State were counted for Mr. Hayes; and when it is remembered that he required all of the electoral votes of these three disputed States to give him a bare majority of one in the electoral college, and that fraud is charged to have been committed in each of these States, I would ask if the people are not right in their demand for an investigation that will disclose the truth? Anderson has been found guilty by a jury of his peers of fraud in certifying to the electoral vote of Louisiana. The Packard legislature of Louisiana elected a United States Senator, Senator KELLOGG, and with this one act that legislature disappeared. The Senate of the United States passed upon the legality of his election and sustained the Legislature by admitting him to a seat in the Senate. Judge McLin, a member of the late State board of canvassers of Florida, confesses that Mr. Tilden was entitled to the electoral vote of Florida, and that it was secured to Mr. Hayes by fraud.

I have not stated, nor do I intend to state, but a few of the facts going to show that Mr. Tilden was legally entitled to the electoral votes of those three States. What I demand is that the people should know the truth. This investigation is not a matter in which Mr. Hayes and Mr. Tilden are solely interested. It is a question of far greater importance. It involves the right of the ballot, the right of the people to self-government, and the permanency of our republican form of government. The facts are known; they are openly admitted upon all sides.

One other objection is named, and I believe that to be the last as well as the most dangerous in its results to the future interests of the country. It is said the question involved has been submitted to a tribunal created by Congress, and that tribunal having decided the question we are bound to submit to its decision. Gentlemen forget when they make this objection that this is a representative government, a government of the people; that Congress possesses only such powers as are delegated to it by the Constitution and the people; that the people have never delegated to Congress or to any other branch of the Government the power to barter and dispose of their right to choose their public officers, and, having chosen them, the right to their possession of the office. There is no such power in law, and the act of January 29, 1877, does not and could not grant or confer such a power.

The people cannot legally be divested of their rights without their consent. The officers of the Government are but the servants of the people, and the sooner they so understand the better for them, the better for the future welfare of the Government. As a matter of fact the question as to which electors in the disputed States received a majority of the votes has never been judicially investigated and decided, unless you make the exception of the State of Florida, where the supreme court of the State, after a full investigation of the facts, did decide that Samuel J. Tilden was justly and legally entitled to the four electoral votes of that State. The so-called electoral commission did not investigate or decide the questions of fact, but on the other hand, contrary to the wishes and expectations of all good men, they absolutely refused to hear any proof on the subject, and based their decision solely on technical grounds and the doctrine of State rights. Had they possessed the power and investigated the facts their decision would have been respected for all time to come; but it is for the very reason that the proofs were not heard and because the facts were not investigated that the people are dissatisfied with that decision and now demand at our hands a thorough judicial or other investigation of the facts. They have a right to make this demand and we, their representatives and public servants, have no right to refuse. The people in this Government in their sovereign capacity are greater than their officers. Vox populi vox dei. It matters but little to the people which particular man is President, but it is of paramount importance to them, to their liberties, and to the future safety of the Government that the President be that man who was legally and honestly elected, and not the man whose election was obtained through false and fraudulent returning boards.

Give to the Supreme Court power to investigate these facts. I have confidence that its decision will be just. It will not in a judicial investigation be governed by any party or political considerations. The reputation of the highest court in the land would be involved. It would be a golden opportunity to gain the respect and admiration not only of the people of this country, but of the whole world.

It has been my only object to call the serious attention of the Judiciary Committee of this House and the attention of the country to the great importance of this subject and its bearing upon the future of the nation. I have done so with great reluctance. In my judgment the stability and future permanency of this as well as every democratic form of government largely depends upon the power, ability, and capacity of the Government to unearth the truth and to defeat and punish fraud. Fail in this and national decay will soon follow.

Have we not reached that crisis in public affairs which so many nations have reached, and in which not a few have fallen, when we too must answer whether we, as a nation, have the virtue, the moral courage, and the political integrity to spread the naked truth openly before the whole world, let the consequences to individuals and political parties be what they may? I, sir, have that faith in justice, in right, in the future of the country, and in the integrity of the people that I cannot for a moment believe that we, as the Representatives of the people, will falter in doing our duty, that we will hesitate to do right. We have a duty to perform, and cannot escape it if we would. The nation's honor and the people's rights we must protect and defend. Fraud must be exposed and punished, and truth and justice must prevail. Let us

> Be just and fear not;
> Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
> Thy God's, and truth's.

SHALL WE PAY SOUTHERN WAR CLAIMS?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I have been much interested in the discussion of the bill now before the House, which has been had on this floor at various times. I was somewhat apprehensive, when this bill first came up, that it might pass by a large majority. It was presented to us in such an innocent manner, seemed in itself so harmless, and was wrapped about with such a beautiful covering that it almost won our approval at a glance. As we contemplated the measure and thought what a noble act it would be to assist this literary institution to arise from the dust and once more assume its former position of power and influence, opposition seemed almost disarmed and we were almost persuaded to let the bill pass without saying a word against it. But, sir, to-day all this is changed! Discussion has done its work, and the gentlemen on this side of the House are almost unanimous in their opposition to the passage of this bill. The speeches made a few days ago by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] had the effect to strip from the bill all its beautiful covering, to reveal its true inwardness, and to lay bare to our gaze all the many evils that it contains.

In view of the light that has been thrown upon it, not only by the discussion in this Hall, but by our own individual thought, I ask, would it be wise for us to pass this bill? Taking into consideration all the circumstances, is there any obligation resting upon the Government to pay the claim here set up? Does our duty either to the Government or to this institution demand that we do a thing of this kind? I think not. This institution may have been a most excellent one. It may have, and doubtless has, a very brilliant record. It may have done its work ably and be entitled to great praise. But still, Mr. Speaker, with all these things in its favor, I do not think it would be either wise or safe to pay the claim which is presented to us in this bill.

For one, sir, I do not indorse all that has been said on this floor in praise of this institution. While I agree with much that was said the other day by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] still I do not believe that this institution is entitled to quite such lofty encomiums as they pronounced in its favor. Why, sir, in their efforts to make William and Mary College appear to the best possible advantage these gentlemen allowed their zeal to outrun their discretion. They were so determined to set forth its many excellences in the most attractive light that they seemed to forget that it ever had any defects. In dwelling upon the brilliancy of its history during the first century of its existence they seemed wholly oblivious of the fact that that brilliancy has been very much dimmed during the last fifty years of the present century. I admit, sir, that the speeches of these gentlemen were eloquent, finely worded, and full of beautiful ideas beautifully expressed. I may say that they were remarkable speeches; remarkable not only for what they contain, but much more remarkable for what they do not contain. Search these speeches through from beginning to end and you will find them abounding in praise of this institution for the prominent part it took as an educator during its earlier history, but not a word will you find in regard to its later history or the position it has occupied as an educator during the past fifty years.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] talked most eloquently of the college as it was in the far-off years of the past. He spoke in most enthusiastic terms of its earlier graduates and the prominent part they played in the history of the nation. He named, with commendable pride, such men as Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Tyler, Marshall, and others of a by-gone age who had drunk deeply at this fountain of learning. But why did he not come down to a later day and tell us something of its later graduates? Why did he not connect the nineteenth with the eighteenth century, take in the whole history of the institution even down as late as 1861, and tell us something about its many alumni who distinguished themselves by helping to inaugurate and carry forward the late rebellion?

Here is a long chapter in the history of this institution which the eloquent gentleman might have dwelt upon with interest to many members of this House if not with advantage to the cause which he was advocating. It would be interesting to know why he omitted this important chapter. Was he ashamed to speak of it? Did he think that even his imaginative mind and eloquent lips could not do the subject justice, or did he fear that by speaking of it, by giving us a "plain, unvarnished" history of the whole life of this institution, he might injure the cause for which he spoke? Of course I do not know what the motives were which led the gentleman to give us only a part of this history, but I do know that to many gentlemen on this floor the later history of this institution would have been fully as interesting as its earlier history.

But, sir, in regard to the matter of which I speak, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] did no better than the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.] It is true he said many good things, many true things, and many eloquent things about William and Mary College, but he only spoke of it as it was in its earlier days. He dwelt at some length upon the proud position it formerly occupied in our history and spoke in the highest terms of what it did toward "shaping the thought of the American people." But his eloquence touched only upon the far-off past. He never ventured to come down to this our day and to tell us of the infamous doctrine of State rights which this institution taught for years, nor what a mighty influence this teaching had in bringing about the rebellion. Why did the gentleman omit all this? He cannot have forgotten it. He cannot consider the history of this institution complete without it. He certainly could not have expected to show the full power which this institution has had in "shaping the thought of the American people" without dwelling somewhat on its later history. But, sir, while knowing nothing of the motive which led to this omission, I wish to say to the gentleman that the people of this country care far more what this institution has been during the past twenty-five years than what it was a hundred and fifty or a hundred and seventy-five years ago.

But, Mr. Speaker, turning from this line of thought, I wish to say that I appreciate all that has been said during this discussion about the necessity of encouraging and building up our institutions of learning. We certainly cannot do too much in this direction. We cannot deal too liberally with these institutions or do too much to promote education among all classes of our citizens. Believing that the wisdom and purity of our laws and the perpetuity of our Government depend largely upon the intelligence of the people, I will go as far as any man in helping forward the schools, academies, and colleges of the land and making them as efficient as possible. Were the proposition before us now simply a proposition to give aid to a needy educational institution, I would gladly give it my support. Did the bill now under discussion have no other significance than to give a few thousand dollars to William and Mary College, I would interpose no objection. On the contrary, sir, for the sake of giving a new impetus to the cause of education in the State of Virginia, I might be persuaded to overlook the black record which this college has made during the last quarter of a century in teaching the doctrine of secession and in helping on the late rebellion, and vote for the measure now before us.

But, sir, the question before this House is not simply a question of granting a little pecuniary assistance to this college. It is a question of much broader and weightier significance than that. The great question which is involved in this bill and which we are called upon to decide is not merely whether or not we shall pay a few thousand dollars to William and Mary College, but whether or not we shall pay the hundreds and thousands of claims that are now being pressed upon us by the people of the South for property destroyed during the war. This, Mr. Speaker, is the all-important question, and it is of the most vital importance that every gentleman upon this floor should understand it thoroughly before he votes upon it. I know that the gentlemen who favor this bill ridicule this idea. They characterize all such talk as nonsense and bosh. They say that this claim has no connection whatever with any other southern claim, that there is not another claim in the whole South like this, and hence this, if allowed, will carry with it no particular significance and cannot possibly establish a precedent for allowing any other claim.

Now, sir, these gentlemen may be honest in what they say, but I must beg leave to differ from them. I believe, sir, that if this bill once becomes a law it will open the way for every claimant in the South to come forward with his claim and demand that the Government pay it. With this case as a precedent, he can march boldly up to Congress and say: "You paid for losses sustained by William and Mary College; now pay me for the losses which I sustained. If it was right to pay that claim, it is right to pay mine." And I ask, sir, if this would not be sound reasoning. Could he not by this line of argument make for himself a strong case? On the ground of right and justice, is not the claim of the private individual entitled to the same consideration as the claim of this college? Is not the equity in one case as clear as that in the other? I for one believe it is, and, believing this, I say we cannot afford to pass this bill. In a case upon which so many other claims hang it will not do to take any risk. We are here as guardians of the public Treasury, which contains the people's money, and the people will hold us responsible for the manner in which we guard their interests. Our duty in this respect is plain and need not be mistaken. Not only should we keep the door firmly closed against all of these claims, but we should never allow a single bolt to be drawn, for if once the door is unbolted it will be easy to push it wide open, and then the hundreds and thousands of these claims will be thrust in for us to pay.

I am persuaded, sir, that few gentlemen upon this floor fully understand the magnitude of the claims which have been presented to this Congress by the people of the South. I have here an article taken from the New York Tribune of April 13, 1878, which gives a full list of these claims, and which I ask to have printed in connection with my remarks.

The Tribune has already published a complete list of all bills introduced in Congress from the beginning of the session down to March 18 for the purpose of securing public improvements in the South. These public claims reach the enormous aggregate of $192,000,000. The Tribune has since caused to be prepared a complete list of all bills introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives from the beginning of the session down to March 26, presenting private claims. Of these there are nine hundred and eight, of which four hundred and seventy-seven ask for sums less than $10,000. These four hundred and seventy-seven bills there is not space to print in full, but their total is $1,010,000. Of the remaining four hundred and thirty-one private bills, three hundred and twenty—more than one-third of the whole number introduced—are altogether vague, neither stating nor hinting at the amount to which claim is made. This very vagueness is suspicious, and suggests the magnitude of the sum expected. It is certainly fair, however, to suppose that the average amount of these indefinite claims is at least as large as those asking for a definite sum. Upon this basis the aggregate of these three hundred and twenty blind asking claims is $3,500,000. There are one hundred and eleven bills asking for $10,000 or more each, making an aggregate of $5,747,793. The least amount, therefore, asked for by private southern claims introduced in Congress from the beginning of the session to March 26, is $10,247,793. The bills introduced down to March 18 for public improvements in the South call for $192,000,000. The South, therefore, thus far in a single session, has made demands upon the National Treasury for at least $202,000,000.

That this estimate is far below the actual amount for which the South has asked, the counsel for a large number of claimants has already taken pains to prove. Judge T. W. Bartley has published in a Washington paper a long letter in regard to three large classes of claims now before Congress. He divides these claims into three principal classes and makes the following estimates:

Amount of cotton tax	$83,000,000
Balance of captured and abandoned property	14,000,000
Army supply claims	20,000,000
Grand total	117,000,000

If Judge Bartley's figures are taken in place of the quiet and modest estimates which the Tribune has made, the aggregate (1) of the claims for railroads and other public improvements, and (2) of private claims for cotton, war material, captured and abandoned property, &c., &c., will be more than $300,000,000, instead of $202,000,000.

The list of private claims presented in each House, exclusive of those in which the sum specified is less than $10,000, is presented herewith:

List of bills introduced in the Forty-fifth Congress up to March 18, 1878, for payment of southern claims.

RECAPITULATION.

Sum of House bills asking for $10,000 or more	$4,926,793
Sum of Senate bills asking for $10,000 or more	821,000
Total	5,747,793
Sum of amounts less than $10,000	1,010,000
Total of amounts carried out	6,757,793
Least sum to be added for blanks	3,500,000
Least sum called for by private bills	10,257,793
Total amount of public claims	192,000,000
Grand total of southern claims	202,000,000
Approximate grand total on the basis of Judge Bartley's estimates of private claims	300,000,000

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the feast to which we are invited. Here are demands made upon us for over $300,000,000. Doubtless many of these claims are just and should be allowed, but the great majority of them are not entitled to even a hearing. We cannot afford to waste time with them, unless it be simply to declare that we will never pay them.

But, sir, having shown the magnitude of these claims, I wish to say that the general sentiment throughout the South is that these claims ought to be paid. Indeed, sir, the southern people seem determined that they shall be paid. I am aware that there are gentlemen on this floor who will deny this, but, sir, if what I say is not true, what means this vast number of claims coming from every nook and corner of the South which have been thrust into this Congress? If gentlemen are not anxious and determined that these claims shall be paid, why are they presented here and why are we urged to pay them?

It is doubtless true that as a matter of policy the leaders in the South will tell you that they do not expect payment, but when they talk as they feel you will find that nine out of every ten of them hold to the idea that the Government, if it had any respect for justice, would have paid these claims long ago. Why, sir, the idea that the Government owes and ought to pay all damages occasioned by the war throughout the South is so firmly imbedded in the southern mind that it will take several generations to root it out. No man, I care not how great his ability, can be a leader among the southern people unless he openly indorses this idea. There is not a southern gentleman on this floor who would not be overwhelmingly defeated at the coming election if he should dare to stand up here and declare that these claims ought not to be paid. Why, sir, we all know what a great sin was committed in the eyes of the southern people by Mr. Tilden, late democratic candidate for President, when he wrote that letter in opposition to paying these claims. This one act awakened a most bitter sentiment all through the South against him, and to-day wherever Tilden's name is mentioned in that section it is greeted either with a sneer or a curse.

The most unfortunate incident of the late presidential election—was the letter written by Mr. Tilden a short time before the election, saying he would veto any bill proposed to pay southern war claims.

The writing of this letter was Mr. Tilden's great crime, for which the Southern people will never forgive him. His sad fate will doubtless be a warning to all future aspirants for the Presidency, who expect to be elected to that office by the aid of southern democratic votes. The fact is, no democrat can be elected President without the votes of the "solid South," and while the "solid South" may not ask a pledge in favor of paying southern claims, it will hereafter support no one who is pledged against such payment. And, Mr. Speaker, what I have said in regard to aspirants for the Presidency can be said with equal truth in regard to the aspirant for any office at the South. No man can be elected to any office in that section who dares to proclaim himself opposed to paying these southern claims. Men who expect to succeed politically must be in harmony with their people in this respect.

This fact is clearly understood by gentlemen from the South in this House, and it is because they understand it so clearly that they are so earnest and persistent in their efforts to secure the payment of these claims. In pushing these claims these gentlemen are only carrying out the wishes, I may say the demands, of their constituents, who are not only determined that these claims shall be paid, but who urge their payment on the ground of justice to themselves. They hold to the idea that the Government is under obligation to pay them. They go so far as to declare that the claims for captured and abandoned property and for private property taken by the Union Army in the way of supplies constitute a part of the war debt of the nation. Indeed, Judge Bartley, whose little pamphlet was distributed so freely among members of this body a few days ago, argues that the property taken for the subsistence of the Union Army saved the Government from raising money on the sale of its bonds in the sums represented by the value of the property seized and used and that the claims for the payment for this property are as just and as valid a lien upon the Treasury as the bonded debt itself. In fact he thinks they should take precedence of the bonded debt in equity because that debt draws interest, while the claims do not. The Judge presents his case in the strongest light possible and closes his pamphlet of twenty pages with the following significant paragraph:

> The foregoing views are expressed on mature consideration from a sense of duty to several hundred citizens of Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas represented by the undersigned as their counsel. The positions assumed can and will be maintained and cannot be successfully controverted in or out of Congress. If the plain language used is expressive of some feeling, it arises simply from a deep sense of the wrong and injustice done to injured parties, and is not intended to be discourteous, but in all due deference and respectful regard for the public authorities.

Now, sir, it would be well to note this language carefully. Judge Bartley says he is working "from a sense of duty to several hundred citizens" of the South who are pushing their claims with all the vigor and determination possible. He and his clients have taken a position that "can and will be maintained and cannot be successfully controverted in or out of Congress." He apologizes for the strong language used by saying that "it arises simply from a deep sense of wrong and injustice done to injured parties." He advocates the idea that the Government is in duty bound to pay these claims and that it has greatly wronged these claimants in not paying them long ago. And, sir, this same idea is advocated by thousands of southern men to-day. Only a few days ago I received a pamphlet written by Dr. J. F. Foard, of North Carolina, in which the writer discusses this subject at some length, declaring that the Government should pay these claims as a matter of justice and right. After devoting several pages to setting forth the losses sustained by the southern people, he uses these words: "The easiest and best way to heal them"—the wounds made by the war—"is to compensate those who lost so much in the conflict." In a subsequent chapter he says:

> Let us go at this work promptly, earnestly, and honestly, that it may be as a monument of truth and justice, erected in the hearts of our children to remind them of the importance of national honor, peace, and good-will.

The last page of his book contains the following, which will be read with great interest, especially by the Union men of the North:

> That co-operative action be had in this matter, a form of a memorial to Congress is appended to these pages. Let every one who feels an interest in the great work copy and obtain the signatures of his neighbors to it, and inclose it to one of our Senators or Representatives in Congress as early as practicable, and urge its adoption:
> Form of a memorial to congress.
> STATE OF ——— ———,
> County of ———, ———, 187 .
> To the honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:
> We, the citizens of the United States, most respectfully petition your honorable bodies to enact a law by which all citizens of every section of the United States may be paid for all their property destroyed for them by the governments and armies of both sides during the late war between the States, in bonds bearing 3 per cent. interest per annum, maturing within the next hundred years.
> And we also petition that all soldiers, or their legal representatives, of both armies and every section, be paid in bonds or public lands for their lost time, limbs, and lives, while engaged in the late unfortunate civil conflict. And we will ever pray, &c.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the ideas advocated in this little pamphlet of forty pages have a wonderful significance. That these ideas are popular throughout the South is proven by the fact that the first edition of the pamphlet was soon taken by the people and that a second edition has been printed. This one fact speaks volumes. It shows what the real sentiment at the South is, and what sort of reading pleases them. Why, sir, in view of what I have said, who can doubt for a moment that there is a settled determination among the people of the South to secure payment of these claims? I know that it is easy to deny this, to say that such talk is all bosh and nonsense; but, sir, the facts are before us, are known to every gentleman upon this floor, and to them I appeal, knowing that they are stronger and more potent than any denial that can be made.

Of course this William and Mary College claim is a small affair. Taken by itself, it amounts to only a mere trifle. But, sir, when we consider that it is but the forerunner of thousands of other claims that are sure to follow after, then it becomes an affair of wonderful importance. In view of the consequences which must inevitably follow the allowance of this claim, we cannot afford to pass the bill now before us. Indeed, sir, our duty in this matter is clear. If we are true to ourselves as the nation's legislators, we can do but one thing, and that is, to put our feet down so firmly upon this claim and all others like it and crush them out so completely that nothing of the kind will ever be presented here again. If I could have my way I would put a stop to this gigantic effort to rob the Treasury at once and forever. The case is one that demands prompt and heroic treatment, and we should not hesitate to deal with it in a prompt and heroic manner.

But it is said that the people of the South suffered terribly during the war, that their property was taken by the Union forces, that their lands were devastated, and that ruin and desolation followed the march of our armies. This is all doubtless true. War is not the mere sport of a holiday. It is not a mere hawker and huckster of sentiment, but an implacable scourge, whose nature is not to build up, gather together, and enrich, but to scatter, impoverish, and destroy. If there was suffering in the South that suffering was but the inevitable result of the attempt to destroy the Union. It is a well-known fact that our Government conducted the war with the utmost leniency for two long years. We of the North showed a disposition not to harm the people of the South more than we were absolutely obliged to do. We hoped that our "erring brethren" would see the folly of their course and lay down their arms; but when we saw they were determined to fight the war through to the bitter end we began to manifest a little earnestness.

In fact, we determined to do what we ought to have done at the very beginning, make war as though we meant to win and as other nations make it, in all its pitiless and destructive forms. Our object was to hasten the end, to stop the work of destruction and death, and just so far as our armies were made to subsist on the enemy, just so far was the enemy disabled and the end hastened. I, sir, shall not undertake to abate one particle from the hardships and sufferings which were entailed upon the people of the South by this method of making war effective as an agent of peace. No man regrets more than I do the condition of things which made these hardships and sufferings necessary. But, sir, I do not think it would be wise for the Government to step in now and attempt to remove these hardships and sufferings by paying the many claims that are here thrust upon us. On the contrary, sir, I believe the better policy will be to reject these claims and give the southern people to understand that when they go to war they must abide by the consequences. I think that the best way to guard against a second rebellion in this country will be to let the ruts made by the late rebellion remain not only as reminders to ourselves but as instructors for the rising generation. I cannot think that it would be for the common good to efface the track of that mighty whirlwind which the South itself let loose upon the country.

But, sir, when gentlemen talk about the sufferings which the war brought to the people of the South, I must beg them to remember that the people of the North suffered too. Not only were they called upon to give their property, but to give that which was more precious and valuable than property, their kindred and their friends. At the bidding of their Government, sons and husbands and fathers marched forth to battle, and in many cases never returned, leaving in their homes such desolation as no mere destruction of property can ever bring. Now, sir, if we are to pay for the property taken by the Government from the people of the South in order to save its life and bring the war to a close, I demand that first we pay the loyal people of the North for the losses they sustained. I demand that we pay the mother for the loss of her son whose life was given to his country; pay the widows and orphans for the loss of husbands and fathers who sleep to-day in patriots' graves; pay the living Union soldiers for the loss of health and limb while at the front doing their duty; pay the millions of patriots at the North for the time and property and money which they so freely gave, both in the Army and at home, that the nation might live.

If, sir, the payment of these losses is judged to be impracticable, then I demand before we pay these southern claims that we appropriate sufficient money to put our Pension Bureau and Surgeon-General's Office in proper shape so that pensions may be paid promptly to such Union soldiers as are entitled to them. Why, sir, look at the enormous amount of these southern claims. The grand aggregate is over $300,000,000, and gentlemen on the other side persist in pushing these claims upon our attention and demanding that we pay them. And yet, sir, notwithstanding they are making this enormous demand upon us, we cannot get the democratic majority here to give us even a few thousand dollars in order that we may keep our Pension Bureau and Surgeon-General's Office in efficient operation.

It is a well-known fact that, owing to the niggardly appropriations made by the democratic majority of this and the last House, the Surgeon-General's Office is over a year behind in its work. The amount of money set apart for that office has been so limited that it has been absolutely impossible to employ sufficient force to perform the duties of the office. Every gentleman on this floor knows that if a Union soldier applies for a pension to-day and his application has to be referred to the Surgeon-General's Office, (where a large proportion of these applications have to go,) it will be impossible to get an answer to that application if the papers take their regular course before May or June of next year.

Now, sir, I ask if this is as it should be? It may be, Mr. Speaker, that I am all wrong, that I am not in a state of mind which fits me to judge properly as to how things should be run in this era of gush and reconciliation, that I am laboring under a mistake when I imagine that the Union soldier still has some rights under this Government, but nevertheless I do say that this so-called democratic economy, which has so blocked the way against our Union soldiers getting pensions, is a disgrace to any party. I say that if a Union soldier is entitled to a pension at all, he is entitled to it promptly. If he is not entitled to it, he should know it at once. Money enough should be set apart to enable the Surgeon-General not only to bring the work of his office up, but to keep it up so that the soldier who applies for a pension can have an immediate hearing, and not be put off for a year or more as he now is under the reign of the democratic majority of this House.

Why, sir, it is a burning shame to treat these needy, broken-down Union soldiers in this way, and no party, except the democratic party that has always hated Union soldiers, would ever have so treated them. We republicans only ask for a small amount of money, just enough to make it possible to give every soldier an immediate hearing when he applies for a pension; but when we ask, the majority in this House at once strike an attitude of economy and say: "We cannot give it, as we have resolved to cut down expenses." And yet, sir, while thus crying out for "economy" and refusing the Union soldiers what they so richly deserve, this majority come forward and ask us to pay southern claims to the amount of over $300,000,000.

And now, Mr. Speaker, the question is, shall we give them what they ask? Shall we open the door to this enormous amount of claims by voting to give William and Mary College the sum nominated in this bill? I trust not. I know that this college suffered much from the ravages of war. I know also that there was great suffering all through the South, occasioned by the four years of civil conflict between the two sections. But, sir, who is to blame for it all? When a people inaugurate war, they should make up their minds to abide by the result and take the consequences, whatever those consequences may be. When the people of the South organized rebellion and made war upon the Government, they should not only have counted the cost, but should have determined to pay that cost, no matter how heavy it might be or in what shape it might come.

Having appealed to arms, they should be manly enough to accept the result, and not come into this House begging the very Government which they sought to overturn to pay for the property that happened to be destroyed during the vicissitudes of a war which they thrust upon the country. They may not know it, but it is a fact, that the people of the North, who gave so much in time and money and blood and life to save the Union from destruction, will not now suffer themselves willingly to be taxed to lighten the burden which war laid upon those who made war their appeal. We of the North have been generous as no victor under like circumstances ever was, but our generosity can never go as far as that.

Our people did their work during the late war nobly and manfully, and they will continue to do their work nobly and manfully until the last penny of the great war debt is faithfully and honestly paid and until the last Union soldier whose name is on the pension-roll has received the utmost farthing that is due him; but they will never submit, without protest, to be taxed to pay for losses which the southern people entailed upon themselves by their own treasonable course. It is best, Mr. Speaker, to speak plainly in regard to this matter. It is best that those who are pushing these claims in upon us so persistently should understand the sentiment of the northern people in regard to those claims. As one of the representatives of northern sentiment upon this floor I enter my protest against the paying of these claims. I say we cannot afford, either in justice to ourselves or our Government, to take even one step in this direction. Our duty is to resist the beginning, to put an end to this proposed increase of taxation and this threatened drain upon the Treasury by shutting promptly and firmly barring the doors against this entire army of southern claims.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, the deep and profound interest felt and manifested at the present time by the people of this whole country in the questions of taxation, the payment of our public debts, and in the subject of our commercial relations with foreign nations, and the grave importance of all these matters, as affecting the material industries and prosperity of the country, constitute my only apology for taking the time and asking the attention of the House at this time.

Gentlemen who have given the slightest thought or attention to the great questions involved in this bill will readily understand that the single hour given by the rules of this House for debate will scarcely enable a man to cross the threshold of the discussion, much less to examine in detail an act covering fifty-four pages and containing twenty long sections.

I should be glad, had I the time, to take up each item of the bill, compare it with the present law, and show that in nearly every instance the law is right and the bill unwise and radically wrong.

I would be glad to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that it is proposed by this bill to take two-thirds in number of the articles now on the duty list and transfer them to the free list; that it will reduce the annual revenues of the Government at least $9,000,000; that it substitutes ad valorem duties for specific in many cases, thereby increasing the facilities for dishonest importers to swindle the Government; that it is a bill solely for the benefit of the importers and foreign manufacturers as against the merchants, manufacturers, and farmers of our own country; that it is to be followed up by the odious income tax and the destruction of the sinking fund, and that all these evils are to be accomplished, not only in the absence of petitions from the people, but in the very teeth of protests and remonstrances from every branch of business and from every section of the country.

But, sir, one short hour will not admit of such an examination of this bill, and so I must content myself with a brief review of the great American system of protection which this bill is designed to destroy, the fallacies of free trade, and the ruinous effect which this bill would have, should it become a law, upon some of the leading industries of the country.

In the investigation and discussion of great and important questions which affect the welfare and prosperity of the whole people and the honor and credit of the Government, I accept, in its full force and power and shall adhere to in this debate, the declaration made by a band of hardy Vermonters on the 3d of July, 1793:

> Frequent recurrence to fundamental principles and a firm adherence to justice are absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and keep governments free. The people ought therefore to pay particular attention to these points in making and executing such laws as are necessary for the good government of the state.

This declaration, full of wisdom and sound statesmanship, is as true now as it was when proclaimed amid the wilds of the wilderness by the Green Mountain Boys nearly a century ago, and we shall do well to heed the warning and follow the precept.

I am fully aware, sir, that, although the subject of the tariff opens a wide field for exploration and discussion, the whole ground has been explored and often traveled over by some of the wisest and most eminent statesmen this country has ever produced. It will hardly be expected, therefore, that I shall present anything entirely new, or do more, in my brief hour, than simply recall the authorities and renew the arguments behind which the founders of our Government intrenched themselves, and the reasons upon which they based their belief in the great doctrine of protection to American industries. The people of Vermont, although engaged almost exclusively in agricultural pursuits, are now, as they always have been, among the most zealous and earnest advocates of a protective tariff. They believe—

> That labor, both mental and corporal, is not only the most honorable means but the only true source of wealth;
> That it is the duty of our Government, at all times, to protect and encourage the industry of our citizens by making and enforcing such a tariff of protective duties as will secure our home markets from the desperate and disastrous floodings of foreign competition;
> That the farmer and manufacturer are alike vitally interested in such protection, and that the prosperity of all classes and occupations is mainly dependent on the success of our agricultural and manufacturing interests;
> That it is the duty of Congress in the passage of tariff laws to have a due regard to the particular interests of every section of our country, to give such a preference to domestic over foreign products in our own markets, and should so discriminate between articles which we can and those which we cannot produce at home as to give a just, sure, and salutary encouragement to the industry of every American citizen.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the frank and honest sentiments of the intelligent and patriotic people of Vermont. They are broad, statesman-like, and American; they breathe the spirit of the early days of the Republic, and are worthy of the noble people by whom they were uttered.

Now, sir, if anything were necessary, beside the well-grounded convictions of my own judgment, to encourage and spur me up to an earnest support of the protective policy, I should find it in these grand and patriotic utterances of the people of my State.

In the first place, then, Mr. Speaker, I contend that

IT IS THE DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT TO ENCOURAGE THE DIVERSITY OF LABOR AND PROTECT ITS OWN INDUSTRIES.

It is the first duty of the Government to protect and defend its own citizens, and to insure by wise and humane laws their peace and prosperity regardless of all other peoples and nations. It has ever been the mission of enlightened statesmanship to discriminate and legislate with a strict regard to circumstances, and with the view of securing the largest degree of prosperity to all classes within the commonwealth without reference to the policy or practice of other governments.

Protection to home industry and labor is defending the people, guarding their interests, and establishing their prosperity.

A distinguished man once said that no nation ever was or can be prosperous which is not independent, and no nation can be independent which does not rely upon its own resources and control its own markets.

Mr. Wheaton says that—

Every nation exists of itself and for itself, not by the grace or for the benefit of any beyond its boundaries. The nation's chief duty is to attend scrupulously to its own welfare. It should pursue its own ends by its own means, strenuously perfecting its organic law and enhancing its internal vigor.

Again Mr. Wheaton only uttered the same great truth when he said that—

A state is at liberty to regulate its commercial relations with other states according to its own view of its national interests. It has the liberty of making the advantage of the state the rule of its conduct in its negotiations, its friendly connections, and its commerce. The liberty of regulating its commercial relations with other states according to its own views of its national interests is an essential attribute of national independence.

And that—

One of the most essential and important rights of a state, and that which lies at the foundation of all the rest, is the right of self-preservation. It is not only a right with respect to other states but a duty with respect to its own members, and the most solemn and important which the state owes to them.

The history of the world shows that during the ages every strong and prosperous nation has always carefully and jealously regarded its own interests and perseveringly promoted and encouraged its own industries. It is by this wise system of protection to their own industries that the nations of Europe have been enabled to increase their population and wealth, enlarge their commerce, disseminate learning, and maintain their advanced position among the kingdoms of the earth.

We are told by an eminent writer on political economy that "a diversified industry is the natural enemy of slavery, ignorance, idleness, and poverty." If this be true, it should be the policy of our Government to promote the employment of the people, to foster, protect, and encourage all their industries, because this will furnish them with the means of purchase, will produce plenty, cheapen the necessaries of life, and render them accessible and attainable.

One of the reasons why trade is now stagnant and business depressed is because of a lack of diversity of employments and industries among the people induced by the war; there are too many men buying, selling, and trafficking and too few engaged in manufacturing, and mining. Men to get a living rush into trade, brokerage, gambling, speculation, and as a consequence thousands become paupers and a burden to honest producers. All this is power wasted, and often much worse than that, which ought to be productive, and would be to a great extent in ordinary times under the inspiring influence of protective legislation.

M. Chevalier, the great French economist, says:

Every nation owes it to itself to seek the establishment of diversification in the pursuits of its people. In fact it is a positive duty which requires it to so act at each epoch in its progress as to favor the taking possession of all the branches of industry whose acquisition is authorized by the nature of things.

This is the principle which Mr. Greeley evidently had in mind when he said that—

It is the interest and duty of our Government, by diversifying the employments and industries of the people and by the retention or imposition of duties on imports, to retain the control of our own markets, so that we shall be in no danger of being driven therefrom by a foreign competition rendered overwhelming by the far cheaper labor and more abundant as well as cheaper capital of Europe.

It is said by the advocates of free trade that protection builds up the manufacturer at the expense of the farmer; but a careful study of the principle upon which such an argument is based and of the history of our country from 1816 down to the present time, will convince the most skeptical and doubting that diversity of employments and industries can only exist under protection, and that where these are "successfully promoted agriculture finds its readiest markets and earns its richest rewards." As years roll on, questions touching the commercial relations of this country with foreign nations assume gigantic proportions and rise in grandeur and importance, of the extent of which I fear we have but a slight conception.

Mr. Greeley said, when contemplating this subject, that "the commerce of Thebes or of Tyre, of Carthage or of Alexandria, in their palmy days, was trivial in volume and worth when compared with that whereof London or New York or Chicago is the focus." It should be our object and study to foster and protect this magnificent commerce. Statesmanship can have no higher aim and patriotism can seek no brighter field.

In considering this great question we should remember that the object and purpose of a protective tariff is to create and keep up a strong and healthy competition among all producers in order that the price of all commodities may be regulated and controlled. A decent regard for our own rights and interests demands this of us while England has cheaper labor, capital, and transportation than we have. If we prudently protect and foster our own manufactures and productions there is no good reason why in a few years we may not supply the markets of the world with a vast number of the necessaries of life and articles which enter prominently into the consumption of the nations. In the absence of such protection our markets will be immediately flooded with foreign manufactures, the price of our own will be struck down by cheap money and cheap labor, all competition will be destroyed, and we shall then be compelled to pay much higher prices than are now charged us by our own manufacturers.

Having said all I desire to as to the duty of the Government in respect to the diversity and protection of the labor and industries of the people, I proceed now to define

THE TWO SYSTEMS OF PROTECTION AND FREE TRADE.

It has been said by a wise man that the protective policy aims—

To encourage the industry of our own people in preference to that of an alien people, to develop all the resources of the nation rather than to allow some of them, the most important and useful, to remain undeveloped.

It is a policy of diversified employments and unbounded possibilities for a nation capable of great achievements, rather than a limitation of its powers to such occupations as will prevent it from becoming independent and its people from going forward.

It is not the instrument by which monopolies are to be established, but it is the foe of all monopolies, domestic and foreign, for it encourages the widest competition in productive industry. It is not the instrument by which one class of the community is to be benefited at the expense of another class, for it seeks the common weal by affording employment to all classes. It is not a tax upon one industry for the benefit of another industry, for its design is to impose taxes upon foreign producers that domestic consumers may obtain cheaper commodities, and this is its effect. It is not a hinderance to commerce, but a help to it, for it stimulates internal commerce when it stimulates the development of resources which could have no value if not exchanged for other products, and it aids foreign commerce when it enables a country through the competition and increased skill of its people to produce commodities so cheaply that other countries will be induced to purchase them. It is the policy of patriotism, of progress, of civilization—a policy that defends the weak against the strong and stands resolutely for one's own against all assailants.

The protective policy of the United States has always aimed to advance the welfare of its working people. Protection has benefited them because it has diversified their employments, increased the rewards of their labor, cheapened the cost of the necessaries of life, stimulated enterprise, developed the national resources, expanded commerce between the States and with other countries, prevented the evil of direct taxation, and elevated the whole tone of our national life.

Protection to domestic manufactures means national progress; it encourages skill and genius in the invention and discovery of labor-saving machines; it is the forerunner of advancement and civilization, while free trade strikes them all with a death-like numbness.

Protection is such an exercise of the power of the Government "to lay and collect duties on imports" as shall interpose a check to the importation of the productions of foreign skill, capital, labor, and machinery, to the end that the skill, capital, labor, and machinery of our own citizens may be shielded from ruinous foreign competition, and have full and profitable employment in supplying our own wants.

Byles says protection, instead of being as has been represented a blight and mildew on industry, is a system of universal irrigation, diffusing life and animation where it would otherwise never have flowed, and making even the wilderness blossom and the desert rejoice.

It is often said that protection creates a monopoly, but it can hardly be said to be a monopoly of any branch of business when every man is left free to engage in it if he pleases. Such, then, is protection, while free trade is the exact reverse.

The utter want of confidence of the champions of free trade in their favorite doctrine and their fear of its results is shown by the fact that while they make loud pretensions and threatening denunciations against protection, free trade has never been anywhere or at any time more than a theory. The absolute application of the doctrine among civilized nations has never been witnessed. No nation ever has ventured or now dares venture upon trying the experiment of absolute free trade.

The American Iron Trade in a well-considered and well-written article upon this subject, published in 1876, says:

Theoretical free trade means the free exchange of commodities between nations. It nowhere exists; it is a myth. The only free trade known to civilized nations is that which governs the exchanges between the people of the same country. It is the only kind of free trade that, in the nature of things, ever can exist; for each nation must care for its own interests, and these interests are never identical with the interests of other nations. Great Britain imposes duties upon those commodities entering her ports which it suits her to tax, and upon those which it suits her to admit free of duty she imposes no duty; yet she asks other nations not to impose duties upon such of her products as seek their markets. This is not free trade, nor the shadow of it. It is not fair trade.

Putting aside for the moment the fact that she did not announce her conversion to free trade until within the memory of the present generation, and until it suited the interests of her trading classes to do so, we proceed to inquire whether she now practices the whole of the creed she is so ready to preach to others. We have before us an English reprint of the British tariff that was in force in 1875, with accompanying statements, and from this publication we learn that the government of Great Britain derived an income of £20,637,855 (about $100,000,000) as revenue from customs in the fiscal year 1873-'74. Examining the items of which this aggregate is composed, we learn that the duty on tobacco realized £7,399,074; on tea, £3,251,203; on brandy, £2,248,546; on wine, £1,793,112; and on dried fruits, £457,513. Many other articles paid duty in that year, including beer, coffee, rum, whisky, pickles, vinegar, gold and silver plate, and a long list of such chemical products as alcohol, chloroform, and varnish. In the nine years from 1866 to 1874 the income of the British government from customs amounted to £193,658,436, (about $968,000,000.) The receipts of the United States from customs during the same nine years amounted to $1,668,349,914. Thus Great Britain, nominally a free-trade country, derived from duties on customs in nine years an income equal to 58 per cent. of that derived from the same source by the United States, a country which has a confessedly protective tariff.

The commodities from which Great Britain derives the large customs revenue to which we have alluded are the products of foreign countries, and the duties imposed are a tax upon the industries of those countries for the benefit of the British treasury. Thus, China is made to pay a tax upon her tea sold to the British Islands; Brazil, upon her coffee; Germany, upon her beer and spirits; the South of Europe, upon its currants, raisins, and figs; and the United States, upon her tobacco and distilled grain, her alcohol, &c. These taxes are a restriction upon the free exchange of commodities, and their existence confutes most completely the pretense that Great Britain is a free-trade country. This pretense appears all the more daring when it is considered that the British government and British manufacturers demand of the countries we have named and of other countries that the products of British industry shall not be subjected to the payment of any tax whatever when they enter foreign ports and foreign markets.

From the definition of the two systems which I have given and the manner in which Great Britain understands and practices free trade, I think we may fairly draw a most potent and convincing argument in favor of the great American doctrine of protection, and against the dangerous dogma which she so zealously preaches but fails and refuses to practice.

PROTECTION THE POLICY OF THE FOUNDERS OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

The protective policy has been called by the champions of free trade, for want of any good reasons or sound arguments which could be brought against it, "spoliation," "robbery," and "an odious, hateful, corrupt, and bloated monopoly."

Now, sir, let us examine the record and see whether the fathers and founders of the Republic were in favor of protection or free trade.

At the first session of the First Congress which convened under the then new Constitution Mr. Madison brought forward a tariff bill the preamble of which declared that such a measure was required "for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of domestic manufactures."

President Washington, in his first annual message to Congress, on the 8th of January, 1790, used this emphatic language in regard to the subject of protection:

The safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military supplies.

And in his last annual message, on the 7th of December, 1796, he said:

Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures.

The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of your efforts in every way which shall appear eligible.

At another time he wrote:

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

Jefferson was an ardent supporter of the protective policy, and in his second annual message to Congress, December 15, 1802, thus brought the subject to their attention:

To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises; to foster our fisheries as nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of men; to protect our manufactures; to keep in all things within the pale of our constitutional powers, and cherish the Federal Union as the only rock of our safety—these, fellow-citizens, are the land-marks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings. By continuing to make these the rule of our action we shall endear to our countrymen the true principles of their Constitution and promote a union of sentiment and of action equally auspicious to their happiness and safety.

Again he says:

The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us to a dependence on that nation or be clothed in skins and live like the wild beasts. Experience has taught me that manufacturers are now as necessary to our independence as they are to our comfort.

On the 7th of June, 1809, the House of Representatives resolved—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare and report to this House, at its next session, a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufacturers of the United States.

In accordance with that resolution, on the 17th of April, 1810, Mr. Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, transmitted a report to Congress, in which he strongly recommended protection by increasing the duties on foreign importations.

This resolution and report, together with the investigation and discussion growing out of them, aided by the war, finally led to the partially protective tariff of 1816, and all the blessings to the people and the country which followed in its train.

I come now to President Madison, "the father of the Constitution."

Following the report of Mr. Gallatin, in December, 1810, Mr. Madison, adopting the sentiments of Jefferson on the subject of protection, in speaking of the duty of Congress, said:

It will be worthy at the same time of their just and provident care to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted by the laudable exertion of our citizens.

Although other subjects will press upon their deliberations, a portion of them cannot but be well bestowed on the just and sound policy of securing to our manufacturers the success they have attained and are still attaining under the impulse of causes which cannot be permanent. The national interest requires that, with respect to such articles at least as belong to our defense and primary wants, we should not be left in a state of unnecessary dependence on external supplies.

Again I find in his special message to Congress in February, 1815, Mr. Madison urges upon the attention of that body that great interest which seems to be ever present to his mind. Said he:

There is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures of the United States. This source of national independence and wealth I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress.

I come now to President Monroe, who in his inaugural address on the 5th of March, 1817, declared that—

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing as we do all the raw materials, the fruits of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries. * * * Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as by extending the competition it will enhance the price and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

In his annual message to Congress in December of the same year he says:

Our manufactures will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge required in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation. I therefore deem it to be of the greatest importance that Congress should give encouragement and protection to our domestic manufactures.

In his annual message in December, 1821, Mr. Monroe is, if possible, more full and explicit in declaring his views upon this great question than he had ever been before. In referring to this subject he says:

It may fairly be presumed that under the protection given to domestic manufactures by the existing laws we shall become at no distant period a manufacturing country on an extensive scale. Possessing as we do the raw materials in such vast amount, with a capacity to augment them to an indefinite extent; raising within the country aliment of every kind to an amount far exceeding the demand for home consumption, even in the most unfavorable years, and to be obtained always at a very moderate price; skilled also, as our people are, in the mechanic arts and in every improvement calculated to lessen the demand for and the price of labor, it is manifest that their success in every branch of domestic industry may and will be carried, under the encouragement given by the present duties, to an extent to meet any demand which under a fair competition may be made upon it. It cannot be doubted that the more complete our internal resources and the less dependent we are on foreign powers for every national as well as domestic purpose, the greater and more stable will be the public felicity.

By the increase of domestic manufactures will the demand for the rude materials at home be increased, and thus will the dependence of the several parts of the Union on each other and the strength of the Union itself be proportionately augmented.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the broad, manly statements of a patriot and statesman, one who comprehended the vast capacities of our country, its varied productions, its diversified soil and climate, and the mutual dependence of the North and the South, the East and the West, all inviting to the establishment of the great "American system" and forming the basis, if rightfully improved, of an enduring and prosperous country.

Probably the strongest enunciation of the necessity for the encouragement of American manufactures and the doctrine of protection is to be found in a letter written by General Jackson to Dr. Coleman in 1824. In that letter he says:

I will ask what is the real situation of the agriculturist? Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus products? Except for the article of cotton, he has neither a foreign nor a home market.

Does not this clearly prove when there is no market at home or abroad that there is too much labor employed in agriculture and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out at once the remedy. Draw from agriculture the superabundant labor, employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs and distributing labor to a most profitable account, and great benefits to the country will result. Take from agriculture in the United States six hundred thousand men, women, and children, and you at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes. In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the laborers and paupers of Europe feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall be paupers ourselves.

It is therefore my opinion that a careful tariff is much wanted to pay our national debt and afford us the means of that defense within ourselves on which the safety and liberty of our country depend, and last, though not least, give a proper distribution to our labor, which must prove beneficial to the happiness, independence, and wealth of the community.

In his annual message to Congress in 1830, he lays down the doctrine of protection in a manner which is worthy the most serious attention and consideration of every gentleman upon this floor.

After calling the attention of Congress to other matters which he considered of grave importance, he thus speaks of the still greater question of protection:

The power to impose duties upon imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other.

The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to the inspection laws. This authority having thus passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and, consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct.

Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations.

This surely cannot be the case; this indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress. In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

In discussing the question as to the power of Congress to lay and collect taxes and to what purposes the money when collected may be applied, Judge Story says:

Nothing is more clear from the history of commercial nations than the fact that the taxing power is often, very often, applied for other purposes than revenue. It is often applied as a regulation of commerce. It is often applied as a virtual prohibition upon the importation of particular articles, for the encouragement and protection of domestic products and industry; for the support of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; sometimes as a bounty upon an infant manufacture or agricultural product; sometimes as a prerogative power to destroy competition and secure monopoly to the Government.

In concluding my reference to these authorities I need hardly remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that the opinions of these men were the just exponents of the policy adopted and carried out by Congress during the first forty years of the history of our Government and also for the past sixteen years.

During these eventful periods we have had reports, resolutions, and acts of Congress fully sustaining the policy of protection and clearly indicating a most thorough conviction on the part of rulers and people "that it ought to be, and an expectation that it would be, the settled policy of the country" forever.

The history of the subject shows that the highest minds and leading statesmen of this country have been its firm supporters and eloquent advocates, from the origin of the Government down to the present time; and in addition to this, sir, I recognize the important fact that

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY STANDS TO-DAY SOLEMNLY PLEDGED TO THE PROTECTIVE POLICY.

In national convention in 1872 this great party resolved that—

The annual revenue, after paying current expenditures, pensions, and the interest on the public debt, should furnish a moderate balance for the reduction of the principal, and that revenue, except so much as may be derived from a tax upon tobacco and liquors, should be raised by duties upon importations, the details of which should be so adjusted as to aid in securing remunerative wages to labor and promote the industries, prosperity, and growth of the whole country.

And again, at Cincinnati, in 1876, a platform was adopted, which we solemnly promised the people should be carried out and upon the strength of which we achieved a great and glorious victory. In that platform it was declared that—

The revenue necessary for current expenditures and obligations of the public debt must be largely derived from duties on importations, which, so far as possible, should be adjusted to promote the interests of American labor and advance the prosperity of the whole country.

These are the solemn declarations of a great party deliberately made, to stand as one of the articles of its political faith, and the President, the republicans in this House, and every member of the party, North, South, East, and West, are firmly bound by them, and I trust will be honestly and faithfully governed by them.

I desire now to get the attention of the House to

A BRIEF HISTORY OF TARIFF LEGISLATION IN THIS COUNTRY AND ITS EFFECTS UPON BUSINESS.

As I have already said, England had for ages rigidly adhered to the policy of protection. Under its benign influences she had built up her commerce and foreign trade until she had become the mistress of the seas and her manufactories the workshops of the world. Her colonial possessions were held as feeders and tributaries to aid in swelling the great and rising current of her advancement and prosperity.

They were not permitted to manufacture even so much as a "hobnail," but were required to furnish the mills, shops, and factories of the mother country with the raw materials produced by them, and receive in return, in a spirit of thankfulness, the manufactured articles which their necessities required.

One object, which finally led to the separation of the colonies from the mother country and the Declaration of Independence, was that the colonists might have power to regulate their commercial relations with Great Britain and foreign nations according to their own interests and protect and encourage their own domestic productions and manufactures.

It was not long after the formation of the Confederation before it was discovered that the interests of the several States were so diversified and conflicting that any uniformity in the mode of levying taxes or fixing duties upon imports was simply impossible, while there was no power vested in the General Government to regulate and control this difficult, perplexing, and important subject. To remedy this, among a multitude of other evils, the Constitution was adopted and jurisdiction over the whole subject delegated to the General Government by the several States.

The first Congress which assembled under the new Constitution was composed largely of men who had been prominent in council under the Confederation, and had also been members of the convention which framed and adopted the Constitution. It was not strange, therefore, that among the first acts of the new Congress a measure should be inaugurated looking to the protection and encouragement of our then infant manufactures. But although the importance and absolute necessity of such a policy was well understood, yet the power and influence of England was so powerful upon the commerce of the world that it was some years, and after the necessities arising out of the war had put spurs to our intentions, before we were fairly launched upon the commercial sea under the safe convoy of the protective policy.

In reviewing this important period in the commercial history of this country, Mr. Clay, the father and eloquent defender of the American system of protection, once said:

Though protection to manufactures had been declared in its preamble one of the purposes of the first tariff framed and passed under the Federal Constitution; and though protection had been incidentally regarded and affirmed in nearly every modification of it; and though the tariff of 1816 was protective on cotton fabrics and on some manufactures of iron, yet it was not until 1824 that a measure of unqualified protection was passed.

The beneficial effects of the protective tariff of 1824 were thus eloquently described by Mr. Clay:

If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution, it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

And on the other hand, if I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution, which exhibited a scene of the most wide-spread dismay and desolation, it would be exactly that term of seven years which immediately preceded the establishment of the tariff of 1824.

This transformation of the condition of the country from gloom and distress to brightness and prosperity has been mainly the work of American legislation, fostering American industry, instead of allowing it to be controlled by foreign legislation, cherishing foreign industry and interests.

In 1828 Congress, encouraged by the results of the tariff of 1824 and earnestly urged by the people, passed a bill increasing the duties on certain foreign importations, and making it far more protective in its operation than the act of 1824, already referred to.

Under the tariff of 1824, the revenues received from duties on imports increased twenty millions in four years, and under that of 1828 they increased thirty-two millions, during the same length of time, over what they were during the four years preceding the tariff act of 1824.

These facts and figures constitute a strong argument in favor of protection, showing not only a rapid and healthy growth in domestic productions, but a vast increase in our foreign trade.

Under a threat of nullification by South Carolina, Congress in 1833 passed the "compromise" tariff, which provided for a gradual reduction of duties from 31 per cent., the amount fixed by the bill, to about 20 per cent. in the course of ten years, the operation of which before the expiration of the time limited culminated in the general prostration of business, the bankruptcy of the people, and led to the passage of the tariff act of 1842.

The condition of the country at that time and the salutary effect produced by that act upon the industries and business of the people have been graphically described by one who occupied a prominent position in the councils of the nation at that time. He says:

A whig Congress, however, in 1842, by a more protective tariff, snatched the country from the brink of ruin. That act was framed on the principles enunciated by the fathers, and as if by magic wrought a wonderful change.

It opened the cotton and woolen manufactories, it lighted the fires in the furnaces and forges, it gave to the farmer a better market for his produce, and in a short time by internal competition it lowered the prices of textile fabrics and of iron far below those which had been imposed on us when English manufacturers had obtained control of our market.

So beneficial was it, and so encouraging to our industries, and withal so popular, that when the presidential campaign of 1844 was in progress the democratic party availed themselves of its popularity and emblazoned on their banners the hypocritical political war-cry of "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842." They knew it was acceptable to the masses, and claimed for their candidate, Polk, that he was "a better tariff man than Henry Clay."

Having by that sign conquered, they were not long in throwing off the mask, and with it renouncing the old-fashioned patriotic American doctrine of protection to our people, and signalized their hypocrisy in the Walker tariff of 1846, reducing the average rates of duty about 25 per cent., or from an average of 32¼ per cent. to 24 per cent. Not content with the prostration this reduction caused, in 1857 they reduced it to an average of about 19 per cent., at which figure it substantially remained until the advent of a republican administration in 1861.

These free-trade tariffs in the mean time had done their perfect work. They had prostrated business, closed manufactories, discharged workmen, embarrassed the Government, and occasioned general distress. So low had they run the revenues of the Government that the closing months of James Buchanan's administration revealed an empty Treasury and a credit so bad that his Secretary of the Treasury could not obtain the trifling loan of $10,000,000 on better terms than $90 for a hundred-dollar bond.

When the republican party assumed the control of the Government, in March, 1861, it found itself confronted with a gigantic rebellion, an empty Treasury, and in pressing need of millions of money.

Among the first measures adopted by Congress, and approved by Mr. Lincoln, was an act laying additional duties upon foreign importations, with the double purpose of increasing the revenues of the Government and affording protection and encouragement to our prostrate and languishing manufactures.

The act of 1861, which was largely protective, was followed up in the same direction by that of 1862, which is called, in honor of its distinguished author and advocate, the "Morrill tariff," and these acts were amended and modified as time and experience suggested, with a view to protection and revenue, until they were finally crystallized into the wise and wholesome law which now stands upon the statute-book.

The history of our country during the last fifteen years, notwithstanding the terrible effects of the war, during which time we have lived under the policy of fostering and protecting our own productions and industries, has no parallel in the annals of the world. Our increase in wealth and population, the development of our agricultural and manufacturing industries, the extension and improvement of our means of transportation, the growth and expansion of our commercial and industrial relations with the nations of the world, and our progress in learning and civilization are almost beyond the patriot's hope or the expectation of the most sanguine among the fathers.

In answer to the question, what has the tariff had to do with this advancement and prosperity and what has the protective policy accomplished during that time, I reply that, "it sustained the war."

It is true that funds were raised through other sources; but the tariff was the controlling influence in replenishing the Treasury, providing the sinews of war, and paying war debts, by contributing from one hundred up to more than two hundred million dollars per annum. Without this revenue not a dollar could have been raised on United States bonds in Europe. They would have remained untouched, as in the days of the Buchanan administration, and the nation would have been severed and sacrificed to the spirit of secession—its fragmentary remains today affording a sorry sequel to the experiment of republican government.

The tariff restored the lost credit of the Government and more than doubled its borrowing power.

Under Buchanan's administration loans could not be obtained except at the ruinous discount of 12 per cent.; now loans of five hundred millions can easily be obtained at 4 or 4½ per cent., and until the agitation of this subject by Congress the capitalists of the world were knocking at the doors of the National Treasury and begging for our bonds at that rate.

The tariff has also, during that time, more than doubled the manufacturing power of the nation. Hundreds of new industries have sprung into existence that would not have been attempted under a low tariff and against the competition of older manufacturing countries. The crisis of 1873, let it be understood, was the result, not of stagnation under a high tariff, but of the consummate folly of speculative expansion. The tariff saved the country from the prostration that would otherwise have inevitably followed close after the war; but injudicious speculation blocked the wheels of business at a later period. This has now nearly effected its own cure, and under a judicious tariff there is a bright future ahead.

THE TESTIMONY OF ENGLAND IN FAVOR OF PROTECTION.

It is a fact which no one will dispute, that England attained to all her greatness as a commercial nation by a rigid adherence to the policy of protection: that it was solely in consequence of the encouragement extended to her own industries and her almost superhuman efforts in building up and increasing her own manufactures under the guardian care of a protective tariff, which amounted in many cases to prohibition, which enabled her in the process of time to command the markets of the world and supply the people of all nations with the necessaries of life; and it is also just as true that while she adhered to that policy she prospered, but when she partially abandoned it her commerce and trade began to decline until she is now not only losing her hold upon foreign markets but is absolutely compelled to contest the palm in her own with the manufacturers of America and other nations which protect and encourage their own industries.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, how English statesmen and economists eulogize the American system of protection and bewail their own fate. The Birmingham Iron Trade Circular thus discourses upon the glowing future of the protective policy in this country:

The ascendence of the protectionist party in the United States still continues to operate most favorably for the manufacturing interests there, and it is no wonder that under such benignant auspices the enterprise in this direction is swelling to colossal proportions.

The London Times, the accredited organ of the government, only a few months ago, said, in speaking of the contest between England and the United States for commercial supremacy:

The Americans are on the point of becoming our most dangerous rivals; we have watched closely during the last few years their rapid progress as a manufacturing people; their spirit and enterprise are boundless; they have imported the very newest and best machinery of England, Belgium, Germany, and France; they have tempted away, through agents sent over for the purpose, skilled workmen from each of these countries, giving preference, however, to those of England; and they are rapidly training an army of skilled workmen for themselves.

Again, in speaking of the wisdom of American statesmen in clinging to the protective policy, and the ruin which would result to us if we should abandon it, the Times says:

It is absurd to suppose that in these days of individual competition English statesmen can really expect foreign governments to expose their people to the competition of Englishmen; they never will do it. Why, if America admitted the free importation of British goods, that country would be immediately inundated with such a vast quantity of all classes of manufactures that its own people would stand no chance, and hence it is it imposes such heavy duties.

The British Trade Journal of a recent date remarks:

We are only just beginning to feel the effects of that American competition which but a few years back was contemptuously dismissed as a mere bugbear. The day of illusion is now past, however, and the conviction is forcing itself home that our manufacturers will, in the not very remote future, be severely taxed to hold their own against competitors enjoying advantages of which they know full well how to make the best use. With that inventive genius which seems to be their special inheritance, the Americans adapt machinery to all purposes, and their labor-saving contrivances bring down the cost of production to an irreducible minimum. The boundless wealth of their country in coal and iron, those backbones of productive toil; its splendid yield of raw material, and unique resources generally, make it the natural home of manufacturing industry. And when to these advantages is added the powerful prop that protection affords, it is inevitable that America should force its way into the van of manufacturing nations.

Now, sir, I desire also, in this connection, to call attention to the testimony of Lord Bateman as published in a recent issue of the London Times. He says:

We cannot shut our eyes to the universal collapse of trade and its accompanying distress, be it the mineral, the shipping, the carrying, the agricultural, or the general manufacturing trade. Throughout the country the cry of depression and distress and ruin is the same. It is of no use to blink the question. Facts will speak for themselves. In defiance of all argument and all persuasion, not to say entreaty, on the subject, these awkward facts still remain. Our overtures to other countries are disregarded. Our commercial treaties are not renewed. Our own trade is in a sinking and unprofitable condition. Our exports show a lamentable and alarming and increasing deficit. Our exchequer is affected. And, worse than all, not a single country in Europe, beginning with France and Germany and ending with Spain and Switzerland, to say nothing of the United States of America or our own Australian colonies, can be cajoled by the most specious temptation into following our example of free importations, or opening their ports to the commerce of Great Britain and of the world unrestricted by safeguards in the shape of duties framed to protect their own native industries.

We have tried free trade, and it has been found wanting. We have done our best to impress other countries with the reasonableness of our policy, and in return they scoff at our blindness and turn a deaf ear to our remonstrances. In the mean time partial ruin and wholesale depression and distress are staring us in the face. Our local burdens are increasing, our exports diminishing. Our working classes, unsettled, are waging open war in the cause of labor against capital, discontented because unable to find the real cause of their discontent, clamoring for their participation in profits which can hardly be said to exist, and yet unable to account for the hesitation and inability of their employers to accede to what they consider are only their just demands.

Why should we persist in such a Utopian crusade? Why have we cut adrift from our old anchorage to launch our good ship upon a treacherous torrent, which is hurling us helplessly to imminent shipwreck? In Heaven's name, if we are on the wrong track let us arrest our downward course. Do not let us, for the sake of a Quixotic theory, blind our eyes to the fact that our trade is ruinously slipping from us, and that we are sacrificing our best and dearest interests to an unacceptable idea.

There are indications that the tide of public opinion is undergoing a gradual and therefore a more convincing change. I hail it with satisfaction. After all, the argument that comes home to every one's pocket is the most cogent, and is worth all the theories and all the lectures of all the political economists in the world.

I appeal to the common sense and to the patriotism of my countrymen; and if they are convinced how great has been the fallacy of our free trade policy without reciprocity, it is for them to say, as I believe sincerely they will say, whether a return to a policy of limited protection, so far from being impossible or undesirable, is not the true and simple solution of our present difficulties, which will tend, in a more simple and natural way than any other, to retrieve our losses, increase our revenue, lighten our burdens, bring peace, contentment, and employment to our working classes, and teach them and us to bless the day which restored the old policy and the old watchword of "Protection to native British industry."

This evidence could be multiplied to an unlimited extent, but enough has already been produced to show that England herself regrets the folly which led her to abandon the protective policy, and is constrained in the light of passing events to bestow a well-merited compliment upon the wisdom and sagacity of those nations which still adhere to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us

TEST THE FRUITS OF PROTECTION AND FREE TRADE IN THIS COUNTRY AND IN ENGLAND.

If it is true that protection robs labor and imposes taxes upon consumers, the people of England, under the "blessings of free trade," ought to be more prosperous and happy than the wretched victims of "the ruinous policy of protection" in the United States.

A very brief examination of this subject can hardly fail to satisfy the most bigoted and obdurate that peace, happiness, and prosperity are the rich fruits and sure reward of protected industry, while idleness, misery, poverty, and ruin just as surely follow in the track of free trade. England to-day has one pauper to every twenty-one persons, or in other words, 5 per cent. of her entire population are in the poor-house, while in this country we have only one pauper to every three hundred and thirty-two persons, or $\frac{3}{10}$ of 1 per cent. of our population on the poor-list. In that country, now the paradise of free trade and the happy home of free-trade missionaries, the people pay annually $17 tax for every person, while in this land of protection we are only required to pay the small pittance of $5.25. She pays a tax of $182,000,000 annually on liquors, tobacco, and snuff, while we, under the Maine law, get along by paying only $98,000,000. Since her adoption of the free-trade policy in 1846 her wealth has increased only 37 per cent., while ours during the same time has advanced 126 per cent. If we turn to the question of wages, we shall find that the same difference exists in favor of this country; while she pays her laborers barely enough to sustain life, ours are in the main amply and generously rewarded.

To rescue the manufacturing interests of the country from utter ruin, in 1847 she repealed her corn laws, because unless she had made bread cheaper her laboring-men would have starved or emigrated. She could not continue the manufacture of cheap iron and cheap cloth and at the same time charge her famishing laborers an exorbitant price for her bread.

The difference in the condition of the laborers in the two countries is wide and marked. While the poor man here has his church and school-house and comfortable cottage and clothes and food and money in the savings-bank, the wretched laborer in England has nothing but poverty, misery, ignorance, and want.

I therefore insist that both history and experience demonstrate the fact that

NATIONAL PROSPERITY HAS BEEN THE FRUIT OF PROTECTION, RUIN AND DISASTER THAT OF FREE TRADE.

I have already shown that England obtained the prize of commercial supremacy by a system of rigid protection which extended to the prohibition of the exporting of tools and machinery, not allowing even artisans and skilled mechanics to migrate, and by paying government subsidies to steamship companies and inventors.

Her policy was to stifle the infant manufactures of all other countries and build up her own. "She sought to carry out her own goods as much manufactured as possible and bring in those of other nations as little manufactured as the nature of mutual commerce would allow."

Pitt carried on his wars by the aid of protection, and Cromwell and the Prince of Orange built up England under its influence. While she followed this policy she held the supremacy; when she faltered and abandoned it she was deposed and lost her power.

Protection, more than the power of Napoleon's armies, gave France the name of the "Great Nation." France profited by the lessons taught her by the Emperor, and when Prussia fined her a billion dollars she at once raised her tariff, set her shops and manufactories at work, paid her debt, grew rich, and has to-day more gold in her treasury than any other nation on earth. As was well said by a distinguished member upon this floor but a few months ago:

One fact, sir, is worth a dozen of theories; and the great fact that to-day stands out before the world, illustrating the soundness of the protective policy, is the financial and industrial condition of France. But a few years ago, when the victorious German army marched up to the gates and into the city of Paris, and compelled that proud nation to capitulate, Bismarck imposed an indemnity upon the nation of $1,000,000,000 in gold. Bismarck intended to impoverish the French people to the extent that they could not give Germany any more trouble for a generation to come. What has been the result? France increased her duties on importations, and on many articles the duties amounted to an entire prohibition, and at once put her wheels and hammers and spindles in operation all over the land, and the result has been that France has paid the indemnity imposed, and to-day has more gold and silver in her coffers than any nation in the world; and her exports during the last fiscal year have amounted to over $800,000,000. Her exports have exceeded her imports over $100,000,000 annually.

The history of our own country fully and eloquently supports the proposition I have stated. During the periods of protection our revenues have been steady and ample, our foreign trade has increased, labor has been well employed and well paid, capital has been active and safe, products have commanded a good price, the consumption of cotton, wool, iron, and coal have nearly doubled, and peace, prosperity, and plenty have been the constant and happy lot of all our people.

Following in the same direction, and swelling this mighty volume of evidence, come Germany, Russia, Spain, Denmark, Sweden, and Belgium, which have all adopted the protective policy, have built up a rich and mighty commerce, and have become first-class powers among the nations of the earth, while Ireland, Portugal, Turkey, Egypt, Peru, and the West Indies, having adopted the system of free trade, have become impoverished, weak, and dependent, and to-day their commerce is scarcely worthy the name.

Sir, the great exhibitions at London, Paris, Vienna, and Philadelphia, as has been said by Mr. Byles, fully demonstrate the fact that no nation can build up manufactures except by the protection of its own industries and labor.

If you had explored those magnificent buildings at Philadelphia you would have found the marvels of industry created and matured by protection shining everywhere, above, below, around, and on all sides. But what had unprotected industry to show? If unregulated exchanges are not only the most congenial and invigorating, but the natural atmosphere of manufacturing industry, surely the advocates of free trade ought to be able to point out some specimens of its rise and luxuriant growth, under such obvious and favorable circumstances. But we search and ransack, not only those great exhibitions, but the world, in vain for even one trophy of a great manufacture not indebted to protection for its existence.

Again, sir, I contend without fear of successful contradiction that PROTECTION INCREASES INSTEAD OF DESTROYS FOREIGN TRADE.

No part of the grand system of errors, deception, and falsehood, known by the name of "free trade" or "revenue reform," has been more loudly proclaimed or more persistently adhered to by those who desire to protect foreign productions and manufactures in preference to our own than the specious and fallacious dogma that a protective tariff breaks down and destroys our foreign trade. No nation has ever adopted the theory and practice of protection to the same extent and with the same zeal that England did. For centuries the protective policy was unquestioned and triumphant, and for centuries her foreign trade steadily but surely increased. In her case the strictest protection coincided with the greatest foreign trade. In the nature of things it could not be otherwise, because the domestic activity, industry, and prosperity, fostered by the protective system was the sure and solid basis of an extensive permanent and mutual foreign trade.

With protection and a certain home market the means of purchase were created and multiplied to a most marvelous degree, and the more money the people had, of course the more necessaries, and luxuries even, they would purchase.

It was the policy of protection adopted by England centuries ago and zealously adhered to down to 1846, that built up for her a vast monopoly of foreign trade, that sent her ships into every sea, and spread the wings of her commerce over every land, and not the chimerical schemes of the Cobden Club nor the visionary theories and wild fancies of Sir Robert Peel.

If we turn to the history of our own country we shall find still more potent and convincing proofs of the truth of the position I have taken.

During the periods when we have been blessed with a protective tariff our foreign trade has largely increased, as will be seen by reference to the figures, resulting legitimately from a large increase of domestic manufactures, revival of business, and a spirited competition among home producers by which the people's pockets have been filled with money, thus enabling them to purchase of foreigners whatever luxuries their wants demanded or their appetites craved.

In further support of the proposition I have stated I beg leave to refer to the following tables, and statements connected with them, which I take from a speech delivered by Hon. JAY A. HUBBELL, of Michigan, upon this floor during the last Congress:

FREE-TRADE FALLACIES—OUR FOREIGN COMMERCE.

One of the arguments most persistently adhered to by free-traders is in support of their favorite dogma that "protection destroys foreign commerce." Like most of their claims, this one is without foundation. Our tariffs have been higher, very much higher, during the last fourteen years than ever before. During this period the increase in our foreign commerce has been great beyond precedent. Here are the official figures showing the results:

Fourteen years under partial free trade.

Fiscal year.	Domestic exports.	Import entries.	Exports of imports.
1848	$132,904,121	$154,998,928	$21,128,010
1849	132,666,955	147,857,439	13,088,865
1850	136,946,912	178,138,318	14,951,808
1851	196,689,718	216,224,932	21,698,293
1852	192,368,984	212,945,442	17,2-9,382
1853	213,417,697	267,978,647	17,538,460
1854	252,047,806	304,502,381	24,850,194
1856	310,586,330	314,639,942	16,378,578

These are extraordinary and significant results. They are silent but unanswerable arguments against the free-trade theories and in favor of the protective policy. There is not only an unprecedented expansion of exports and imports, but it will be observed that in nearly every year the exports exceed the imports during the later period of high-tariff experience.

Coming now to our agricultural exports, included in the following table, we find, by reference to elaborate tables prepared by Mr. David H. Mason from the commerce and navigation reports of the General Government, that they have been greater under the present protective policy than under the previous policy of partial free trade. Without entering into needless details, we compile from Mr. Mason's tables a statement of the export of three leading agricultural staples, wheat, wheat flour, and Indian corn, in thirteen years under partial free trade and in thirteen years under protection.

If we examine the receipts of the revenue we shall find that under fifteen years of high-duty tariffs the revenue was more than three times as much as under fifteen years of low-duty tariffs. The following table, which I take from the Bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association, conclusively proves what I have said:

The figures contained in these tables conclusively refute the theory of free-traders and furnish "silent but unanswerable arguments against such dogmas and in favor of the protective policy."

Another proposition which has been conclusively settled by the history and experience of nations is that

PROTECTION CHEAPENS INSTEAD OF ENHANCES THE PRICE OF COMMODITIES TO THE CONSUMER.

It has always been a favorite theory of the advocates of free trade, and one on which they have delighted to dwell, that protection enhances the price of every protected article by adding to the price of the article the amount which the importer is compelled to pay as duty to the Government.

This false but plausible argument has been used with great effect with those who have never carefully studied the subject, and is even at the present day accepted by a large class of unthinking people as a conclusive argument against the adoption of the protective policy. But a very brief examination of the practical workings and effects of this system will convince every candid mind that instead of enhancing the price of either the imported article or that produced at home it actually cheapens them both to the consumer. The reasons for this are clear and cogent, and may be understood by the weakest head in the free-trade school.

Horace Greeley was a man of strong common sense and vast practical knowledge, and the book he wrote on political economy should be in the hands of every American citizen. In that little book he has completely exploded the vague and false theories of Mr. Wells and his Cobden Club by arguments and illustrations drawn from the current business of every-day life. In speaking upon this subject he says:

> The price of an article is always governed by the cost of producing it. Protection does not raise the price of domestic productions, because any advance in the price induces others to enter into the business, and soon a competition springs up, the effect of which is to reduce rather than raise the price.
> There is no doubt that a protective tariff, to a certain extent, shuts out foreign and enlarges the market for our own fabrics, because this is the purpose of it; but the effect is not to raise prices, because our manufacturers can afford to make them cheaper when they run their own machinery on full time in presence of an ample and eager market than when running capriciously and when obliged to keep their goods on hand for months awaiting purchasers, and because competition among these home producers keeps down prices to the point at which a fair living profit can be made.

The effect of a protective tariff in increasing domestic manufactures and in reducing the price is fully illustrated in the case of the manufacture of steel rails in this country:

In 1867 we manufactured only 2 tons; in 1872, 7 tons; 9 tons in 1869; 34 tons in 1870; 38 tons in 1871; 94 tons in 1872; 129 tons in 1873; 144 tons in 1874, and 290 tons in 1875, while the price has been reduced during that time from $185 in gold, the price paid to the British manufacturer, to $60 per ton, now paid to our own manufacturers.

In connection with this subject and as still further elucidating the proposition I am discussing, I avail myself of a tabulated statement made by D. H. Mason, esq., of Chicago, an earnest and intelligent advocate of protection, showing the growth of the cotton and woolen manufactures in this country during the last quarter of a century. I ask the House to consider it.

First, in regard to woolens:

Number of woolen mills	2,891	1,260	1,559

Domestic wool crop ..... pounds	100,102,387	60,264,913	.....

And, then, in regard to cottons:

	1830.	1840.	1850.	1860.	1870.
Looms	33,506	.....	.....	126,313	157,310

Value per hand	.....	.....	668	943	1,310

It is worthy of notice that the manufacture of these articles increased in a far greater ratio from 1860 to 1870, a period of partial protection, than it did from 1850 to 1860, when we were controlled by a policy of partial free trade.

This vast increase of manufactures was followed by a gradual reduction of prices, until in 1870 nearly all cotton fabrics, whether made in this country or Europe, were at least 50 per cent. lower in our markets than they were in 1850.

The additional protection and encouragement given to the production of cotton and woolen goods by the tariffs of 1861 and following induced the investment of large amounts of capital in the business, and the consequence was a vast increase of the amount manufactured, a sharp competition among producers, and a marked saving to consumers by the reduction of prices.

This increase of home productions and reduction of prices was not confined to cotton and woolen manufactures, but extended to nearly every article required by the people or that entered into the supplies for the Army and Navy.

I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to get the attention of the House to

THE ADVANTAGES OF A HOME MARKET TO ALL CLASSES OF OUR PEOPLE.

All wealth comes from labor, consequently it should be fully employed and reasonably rewarded. It is upon the products of the soil that a nation depends for its prosperity.

The effect of protection is to encourage home production, which creates a home market for the farmer and cheapens the articles produced to the consumer; because the more the farmer sells the more he can afford to buy, and the more the manufacturer sells the cheaper he can afford it.

What we need and what we must have is a home market for our surplus products. Manufactures will create it and a judicious protective tariff will build up and sustain it.

Mr. KELLEY very truly says that it is a law of universal application that he who has to carry his commodities to a distant market must pay all the charges, while he whose goods are sought by customers fixes his own prices and makes the purchaser pay all charges.

When producer and consumer are brought close together transportation and the commissions of middlemen are always saved. Mr. Greeley, in his work on political economy, says that all the edible products which the farmer raises with comparative ease and to the greatest profit must find a market near the point of production or they cannot be disposed of at all without ruinous loss. They are too bulky or too perishable to bear transportation to distant consumers. Thousands of farmers in the West are poor because they have no market at home for their surplus products, and no man can afford to pay charges and transportation to a foreign one. A bushel of corn or wheat is worth as much intrinsically in Iowa and Illinois as it is in London and Paris. The reason why it will sell for only one-fifth as much is because of the cost of sending it to market. If the market was in Iowa and Illinois the farmer could sell it for as much. Protected manufactures will open the iron and coal mines in those States, and that will furnish the market.

> The result of all experience is that the more perfectly the home market is secured to the domestic citizen the greater is the tendency to cheapening the commodity and facilitating its acquisition by those who desire to consume it.

It is said that the nation which manufactures more than it consumes of articles of general use universally leads in commerce.

Byles says, let manufacturing and agricultural industry flourish side by side and you have everywhere occupation and appropriate employment for all your people.

The importance of a home market is thus forcibly stated by Seaman, in his Progress of Nations:

> The question is not so much what a nation can produce, but what its people can sell and get their pay for. Markets, therefore, enter into the question as the great, yea, the greater and most important of all the elements of political economy. The important point is to secure a market; to secure the home market first for their own laborers and manufacturers, as far as they may want it, and thereby create a market for their own domestic products. Markets, I repeat again, are the great stimulants to industry, and of all things in the world they are the most important, and necessary to sustain it.

It is the theory of the protective policy that it builds up the manufacturing interests of the country, diversifies the employments of the people, creates a demand for labor, and makes a home market for the surplus products of the farmer and mechanic.

Under its operation the people are always steadily employed and well paid, and can therefore buy and consume; the farmer and mechanic find a ready market and fair price for all their surplus products; and with the means which this gives them the inclination is never wanting to purchase the luxuries which come to them from abroad.

This makes good the maxim that a prosperous foreign trade is inseparably connected with a prosperous home market. The markets of this country belong to our own people, and foreigners have no cause to complain when they are compelled to pay our customs duties as the price for the privilege of selling their goods in them.

It is sometimes said that we could hardly be benefited by increased manufacturing facilities, as we manufacture now more than we can sell.

This may be true perhaps with regard to some few articles, but the books of our custom-houses show that we import annually two hundred and thirty-six million dollars' worth of products, some of them agricultural, which we ought to make and raise ourselves and which we certainly shall if we succeed in defeating this bill and allow our tariff to remain as it now is.

Again, sir, the history of this country shows that

PROTECTION HAS A STRONG TENDENCY TO STIMULATE IMMIGRATION.

Fully believing that population is one of the "main elements of national strength" and that "its rapid, persistent increase implies national growth and prosperity," it has been the well-settled policy of this country, from the organization of the Government down to the present time, to encourage foreign emigration to our shores, and the result has been unprecedented and wonderful.

From 1776 to 1816, during which time we had no protective tariff, the number of emigrants arriving upon our shores was three hundred thousand; and from 1816 to 1869, during a portion of which time we enjoyed the benefits of the protective policy, the number was nearly seven millions.

In order more clearly to demonstrate the point I am discussing, I will give the total number of foreign-born passengers arriving in this country in the several years from 1820 to 1877, inclusive, a part of which I take from a speech made by Judge KELLEY:

Year.	Number of immigrants.	Year.	Number of immigrants.

1848	226,527	1877, (six months only)	79,485

Now, sir, by comparing these figures, leaving entirely out of the calculation the extraordinary impulse given to immigration by the discovery of gold in California in 1848, we shall "find that whenever our duties have been low immigration has fallen off, and whenever our duties have been high the volume of immigration has sensibly increased." This increase is the direct consequence of the establishment and growth of our domestic manufactures, created and stimulated by the healthful influence of the protective policy which has given this increased demand for labor.

Judge KELLEY, in a masterly speech delivered in this House in March, 1870, when remarking upon this subject, said:

It is thus historically demonstrated that precisely as we make our duties protective of high wages for labor do we bring skilled workmen from England, Germany, France, and Belgium to work in our mines, forges, furnaces, rolling-mills, cotton and woolen factories, and create a home market for the grain of Iowa, Illinois, and other great States of the West, whose farmers now complain that they have no market for their crops.

"We can hardly realize at this day the magnificent results of the establishment of manufactures upon our soil, in bringing to our country the very highest order of industrial skill from all parts of the Old World. If we had remained an agricultural people, as we were previous to 1816, we could hardly have expected to draw to this country men of high capacity and mechanical skill, because we should have been unable to proffer them congenial and remunerative employments or to have developed the inventive and higher industrial powers of our native born population." But manufactures, the fruit of protection, working harmoniously with agriculture and commerce, have accomplished all this and while, aided by immigration, our own country has grown rich and powerful, we have endowed mankind with our great inventions and filled the world with the fruits of our marvelous achievements. I therefore contend that if we disturb our present customs regulations at all

WE SHOULD AMEND OUR TARIFF BY REVISING AND REGULATING DUTIES ON IMPORTS IN THE INTEREST OF "PROTECTION" INSTEAD OF REPEALING OR CHANGING ANY OF ITS PROVISIONS IN THE INTEREST OF "FREE TRADE."

With all our vast water-power, exhaustless coal-fields, immense iron-mountains, and unsurpassed means of transportation, we should be satisfied with nothing less than making our country, under judicious protection, the workshop of the world. Our aim should be to increase our manufactures by building mills and shops and factories and forges and furnaces and railroads, so that we may manufacture our own cotton and wool and iron, create a market for our surplus products, bring the producer and consumer nearer together and thus save the cost of transportation and the commissions and profits of the middlemen. The powers of production of this country increase in a ratio four times greater than foreign powers of consumption, consequently they are unable to take our surplus products, and we are forced to the creation of a home market or suffer the loss.

Why, sir, as I have already intimated, we import annually of breadstuffs, woolens, iron, steel, leather, tobacco, and cotton more than two hundred million dollars' worth, every dollar of which could just as well be produced or manufactured in our own country and would be, in ordinary times, if properly protected by tariff duties. It is among the crowning merits of the protective policy that it builds up these much-needed manufactures, relieves our home markets from foreign fluctuations and excesses, prevents foreign machinations and interference, gives us a stable order of things, tends more and more to increase the price of raw materials and the rate of wages, and reduces the price of finished products. I am frank to confess, sir, that a protective tariff should undergo occasional revisions and modifications. We should, as changes occur to justify it, add to the free list, and when deemed advisable remove the burden of duty from one article and place it upon another. Every article which we do not raise or produce by labor, which enters into general consumption by rich and poor alike, should be placed upon the free list so as to make it as cheap as possible to the consumer.

But all articles of luxury imported from abroad, such as brandies, silks, laces, broadcloths, and diamonds, which are mostly consumed or used by the rich and opulent, and nearly every article which we produce by labor, should be covered by your tariff, so as to secure your revenue and protect your industries; because foreigners ought not to have an equal chance in our markets, in what we produce, while our people have loads of national, State, and local taxes to pay, which they have not.

There are, doubtless, at the present time, some few articles which might very properly be transferred from the duty-paying list to the free column, but in the main the tariff, if changed at all, should be increased instead of being diminished.

Millions of dollars which have been expended in perfecting labor-saving machinery and labor-saving processes of manufacture in this country, upon which large numbers of our citizens are dependent for support, would be completely paralyzed by any material reduction of the present tariff.

I hold, sir, that the Government has by its system of protective duties encouraged these manufactures, and that it is now its duty to protect them. The farming, manufacturing, and industrial interests of my own State are yet in a condition to need the fostering care of the Government, in the form of a protective tariff, in order that they may prosper or live even under the burdens which the war has heaped upon them and the cheap labor competition of foreign countries. The men engaged in these industries are American citizens, and they do not beg and supplicate for this protection, but they demand it as a right. The men whose money and lives have been spent in improving your flocks and herds and elevating the standard of your productions toward a point where competition with foreigners may be possible, and who are now in the very gristle and infancy of these great and important national enterprises, richly deserve and should receive protection from the inundation of foreign importations which a reduction of the present tariff would most certainly produce.

Pass the bill which has been reported, modify and cut down the tariff as you propose, and you will ruin every wool producer, stop every mill, and close up every marble and slate quarry in my State, throw thousands of industrious laboring-men out of employment, and take twenty or thirty millions of capital now invested in that business from the productive power of the country and reduce its owners to bankruptcy and ruin.

In 1875 we purchased foreign goods to the amount of $547,000,000, on which we collected $154,000,000 in import duties. Under the reductions of the tariff bill which has been reported to the House and is now before us for consideration, to raise that amount of revenue we should be obliged to import probably to the amount of six or seven hundred million dollars' worth of goods annually, an amount which would put out the fire in every furnace, stop the wheels in every mill in the country, and send millions of honest laborers to the poor-house.

Every dollar's worth we purchase abroad when we can produce the same article at home, we to that extent rob the honest labor of this country and assist the foreign artisan. If you reduce the tariff the manufacturer must cut down the wages of his men or shut up his works, because every dollar you reduce the tariff will reduce the wages of the laborer in the same proportion.

Now, sir, if you remove protection from domestic industries and thus reduce wages so that you may be able to compete with the producers and manufacturers of England in a free market the inevitable consequence will be that your labor will become uneasy and restive, it will breed strikes and all manner of dangerous and damaging combinations, the fruit of which will be bankruptcy and ruin to the employer and want and starvation to the employed.

In view of our national debt and the present prostrate condition of business, it would seem to be the highest duty of Congress to inaugurate and mature such measures as shall revive the languishing industries of the country and restore commercial confidence among the people.

It is no time for speculation and wild experiments. Frightened capital, always sensitive and timid, dare not now launch into manufacturing, for fear that by a reduction of the tariff it may be compelled to compete with the cheap capital, labor, and transportation of all Europe. What capital craves and the people demand is stability and certainty, a sound, judicious, protective tariff, and to have Congress let it alone.

If you recklessly reduce the tariff you will literally crush out of existence nearly every branch of our young and struggling manufactures. If you break down manufactures then you drive all the men engaged in them to agriculture, where you already have an overplus, and the result will be idleness, bankruptcy, and distress.

If every man is compelled to become a farmer and raise his own meat and bread, where will you find a market for all your vast surplus products? You cannot sell them at home, because every man raises his own. You cannot sell them abroad, because Europe now raises nearly all the farm products they consume, having taken only about one-tenth part of our annual surplus for the last thirty years.

Another evil which would most certainly result from a reduction of our present tariff would be a vast increase of importations, swelling our debt to foreign nations, compelling us in order to meet it to export gold and silver, and if after that was exhausted a balance should remain, it must be paid with the bonds of the Government upon which we and our children would be forced to pay interest for long years to come to those who would laugh at our folly and mock at our calamities.

Let us not, Mr. Speaker, depart from the ancient landmarks of the Republic, but let us rather follow in the footsteps of the fathers, defending the inheritance they bequeathed to us, protecting and guarding the labor and industry of our own people, giving no ear to those whose hands are stained with British gold and who would strike down our commerce and rear upon its crumbling ruins "the white flag of submission and cowardice or the black banner of British free trade."

But, sir, if reasons really existed for a revision of the tariff the present is a very inopportune and unfortunate time to do it. Business is depressed, the material industries of the country are paralyzed, and confidence is slow to return. It is a time when capital and labor, employers and employed, and all classes of the people, desire peace and demand a settled and stable commercial policy. Nobody has asked for this legislation unless it is dishonest importers and foreign manufacturers. It is a malicious and unprovoked attack upon some of the leading and most important industries of the country, for which no such lame apology as the speech of the chairman of the committee will be accepted by the people.

Why, sir, it comes like the blight and the mildew, while "every return from the Treasury shows month by month diminishing receipts as compared with last year." It is the decreasing trade, the diminishing production, and the lessened activity in business that causes this falling off in the revenues, all which is the direct result of the wild and disturbing legislation adopted by this Congress.

The first step was the passage of a bill to stop resumption and violate the solemn pledges of the Government. But thanks to a kind Providence, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the intelligent level-headed people of this country, in that case the machinations of the wicked have been brought to naught, and resumption will take place in spite of you long before the time fixed by the statute. Surely in this case the "Lord hath caused the wrath of man to praise him and the remainder he hath restrained."

Next came the act to make ninety cents' worth of silver pay a debt of one dollar, to repudiate to that extent every public and private debt, destroy our credit, and disgrace and humiliate our Government before the world. And these two acts were followed by this tariff bill, which, if not the sum of all villainies, is certainly the sum of all follies. Well may the afflicted people of this country exclaim:

> One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
> So fast they follow.

Now, sir, what has been the result so far of this unwise and unfortunate legislation? The funding of the public debt, by which we save millions of interest, has been materially interfered with, while it has called home seventy-five millions of our bonds from abroad and compelled us to return the gold for them at a time when we could least afford to do it and when we needed the gold at home to aid us in resumption.

And, sir, not only this, but the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House are now charged to the muzzle with all sorts of wild and dangerous schemes to destroy the last remnant of our prosperity and still further disgrace us before the world, which they are ready to launch upon the House the moment an opportunity is presented.

And to crown this monument of folly and madness the Committee of Ways and Means are threatening the people of this country with the restoration of the unjust, unwise, and odious income tax, by which the people of the South are to thrive and fatten while the people of the North who labor are to pay the bills.

Why, sir, it would seem as though the very spirit of mischief and sin had seized upon the majority of this House, driving them to destroy the last vestige of business, tear down and annihilate our credit, tarnish our honor, and sap the very foundations of the Government.

Again, sir, the language of this bill is ambiguous and blind, and will require the almost constant labor of the courts for the next ten years to define and construe its provisions. It increases the proportion of articles on which ad valorem duties are levied, leaves the free list undefined, and throws the door wide open for fraud, swindling, and litigation. It reduces the revenue at least six millions as an offering to free trade, while it raises the tax on sugar, tobacco, and spirits to protect those cherished industries in the South. Louisiana's member on the committee is fed with sugar; the gentleman from Virginia with tobacco; Ohio, with whisky-toddy; while the facile Georgian is lulled and pacified with a promise of sixty cents per bushel on castor beans, which on three pecks will yield the Government a revenue of 45 cents, that being about the annual yield of that article in that fertile and productive State.

But, sir, when you come to other articles in the bill the tables are turned. On cotton and cotton goods the revenue is reduced over $2,000,000, on silk and silk goods over three millions, and on wool and woolens nearly six millions.

This, however, is easily accounted for when we note the fact that these three great and important industries are carried on in the Northern and Eastern States, where the people are able to protect the graves of their great men without appropriations from the General Government and where governors are not called upon to save the State from disgrace or the people from dishonor by a veto.

The chairman of the committee says that the western farmer pays a tax upon his lumber, paints, glass, nails, screws, locks, saws, shoes, thread, hinges, paper, carpets, crockery, linen, door-knobs, &c., and appeals to him to come and find relief in this bill.

Why, sir, this is an old free-trade policy which we have heard upon every corner and read in every free-trade book for the last twenty years. In theory and upon principle it is as false as the creed of the infidel, and when we come to examine it practically we find that nearly every article specified by Mr. WOOD as being used by the farmer and taxed is now of domestic manufacture and is not imported at all.

These articles were nearly or quite all of them imported twenty years ago, when the gentleman from New York, like another famous citizen of his State, fell asleep; but while he has been slumbering we have advanced in production and manufacturing to that extent that we now make our own, and the venerable gentleman forgets that, Rip van Winkle-like, he has now in this tariff bill and his speech come back to us after a somnolent residence in Sleepy Hollow for a score of years.

THE BILL REPORTED BY THE COMMITTEE PERNICIOUS AND ITS TITLE A MISNOMER AND A DELUSION.

I desire now to call the attention of the House for a few moments to some few of the provisions of this bill, which more particularly affect the people I represent. The committee have named this abortion "A bill to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes." This title, as I have said, is a misnomer and a cheat.

It should have been named what it really is, "A bill to diminish duties upon foreign imports for the benefit of New York importers, to discourage and break down trade and commerce, to increase taxation, and build up the commercial prosperity of foreign nations at the expense of our own."

I do not know where this bill was concocted or by whom it was drawn, but that it was created for the joint and sole benefit of foreign producers and the importers of foreign productions there can be no shadow of doubt.

There has been no complaint that I have ever heard of, except from the two small classes of men I have named, in regard to the present law, but on the contrary wide-spread satisfaction and approval. It has been in operation long enough so that all the machinery for the levying and collection of the customs duties has become thoroughly adapted and adjusted, all causes of friction removed, and the whole system is now in the most complete running order.

Under the admirable management of the present distingnished head of the Treasury Department it raises all the revenue we need, grants the reqnired protection to our own industries, and its repeal or modification is sought only by a few large importers and British manufacturers. They are a class of men who would, as the Emperor Francis of Austria once said, set the continent on fire in order that they might secure to themselves the commerce of the world. It would be well for gentlemen to remember while they are attempting to reverse the commercial policy of the Government and curse us with free trade that a vast number of our large manufacturing establishments have been built up under the fostering care of our protective tariff, and that such a radical change as is now proposed by this bill would either ruin them or greatly restrict their operations. I do not mean by this that I would never revise the tariff; on the contrary, I am clearly of the opinion that a careful and prudent revision of it once in eight or ten years would be highly beneficial and greatly increase the prosperity of the country.

But I would have this important work done by men who know how to do it; men who would be willing to avail themselves of the observation and experience of business men, whose knowledge upon all these subjects is acquired by study and practice.

A practical man, who was governed by correct principles and common sense, would, in a revision of our tariff law, change an article from the duty to the free list only when it clearly appeared that the article did not need protection, and that the change if made would not materially injure the manufacture of it.

This principle has been entirely ignored by the gentlemen who are the fathers of record of this bill, as may readily be seen by a comparison of it with the law as it now stands.

But, sir, conceding that an occasional revision of the tariff is expedient and necessary, yet it seems plain to me that the time has not come when we can safely venture upon such an undertaking.

What we require now is a settled, stable policy, with an assurance from Congress that it will not be disturbed or unsettled.

Business is dull, manufacturing drags, and wages are low in this country at the present time; but business is duller, manufacturing drags slower, and wages are lower in England than here, and the moment we cut down our tariff and remove the protection afforded by the present law England will flood our markets with the production of her pauper labor.

The Boston Advertiser, one of the stanchest republican papers in this country, never uttered truer words than when it said, in speaking of this subject, that "a general revision of the tariff cannot be undertaken with any hope of success until the time shall come when the great and leading industries of the world can be permanently carried on here under as favorable conditions and with equal economy as in other nations with whom we have commercial intercourse."

We may be able to form some faint conception of the evils which would be likely to follow the passage of this bill by observing the result of the agitation of the question even upon business men and upon the industrial interests of the country. If the mere discussion of the question by Congress is fraught with such demoralizing and injurious consequences, who does not see that the passage of this bill would greatly reduce our revenue, break down and crush out a large number of our active industries, drive manufacturing out of the country, add thousands to the already large army of unemployed men, flood our markets with the products of the cheap labor of foreign countries, while the consumer would reap no benefit in the reduction of prices and we should become an impoverished and dependent nation?

With these facts before us I "deem it unwise, inexpedient, and hostile to the best interests of the country to make radical changes in a law which an experience of sixteen years has shown to be highly advantageous to the welfare of the nation and to have been the largest factor in the development of our resources."

Now, sir, let me invite the attention of the House to two or three specific articles of American production and commerce with which this bill seeks to interfere and which it is designed to kill.

MARBLE.

Let us look for a moment at the article of marble, which is quarried and manufactured in large quantities in my district.

The producers of marble come in competition in our markets with the imported marble from Italy.

In fixing the duty upon this article, as upon all others, two objects are to be kept in view, namely: to protect our own production and to realize the largest amount of revenue consistent with such protection.

The present law lays a duty of $1 per cubic foot and, in addition, 25 per cent. ad valorem on marble, white statuary, brocatella, sienna, and verd-antique, in block, rough or squared. On veined marble and marble of all other descriptions, not otherwise provided for, in block, rough or squared, 50 cents per cubic foot and, in addition thereto, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

On sawed, dressed, or polished marble, marble slabs, and marble paving tiles, 30 per cent. ad valorem, and, in addition, 25 cents per superficial square foot not exceeding 2 inches in thickness. If more than 2 inches in thickness, 10 cents per foot in addition to the above rate for each inch or fractional part thereof in excess of 2 inches in thickness, but if exceeding 6 inches in thickness it shall be subject to the same duty as marble blocks; and all manufactures of marble not otherwise provided for, 50 per cent. ad valorem.

It is proposed by this bill to reduce the tariff on this article by fixing it as follows:

On statuary, brocatel, sienna, and verd antique, in block, rough, or squared, 75 cents per cubic foot.

On veined marble, and marble of all other descriptions not otherwise provided for, in block, rough, or squared, 40 cents per cubic foot.

On sawed or dressed marble, marble slabs, and marble paving-tiles, twelve cents per square foot, not exceeding one inch in thickness; if more than one inch in thickness, ten cents per square foot in addition to the above rate for each inch or fractional part thereof in excess of one inch.

On all polished marble-slabs and other manufactures of marble, not otherwise provided for, 75 per cent. ad valorem.

On reference to tables which have been kindly furnished me by Professor Young, of the Statistical Bureau, I find that most of the revenue derived from marble is from that which is imported in the block or in a rough state. For instance, the revenue received on imported unmanufactured marble from 1851 to 1866, inclusive, amounted to $983,698.90, while upon manufactured marble during the same period it amounted to only $169,240. And from 1867 to 1877 it amounted on unmanufactured to $3,101,018.25, and on manufactured to $443,866.17.

These figures show most conclusively that it is the rough, unmanufactured article which requires and should receive the protecting care of the Government. From 1851 down to 1846 the duty on unmanufactured marble was 20 per cent. ad valorem, and the average amount of duty received annually was about $31,000. In 1846 the duty was raised to 30 cents, but in 1858 the rate was reduced to 15 per cent., but the amount of revenue received from it remained about the same. In 1862 the duty on white statuary, &c., was increased to 75 per cent., and on veined, &c., 40 per cent., and the revenue advanced from $31,249 in 1862 to $126,191.25 in 1864. In 1864 the duty on white statuary, &c., in blocks was again raised to $1 per cubic foot and 25 per cent. ad valorem, and the next year the revenue went up to $182,433. The same year also the duty on veined marble in blocks or rough was changed to 50 cents per cubic foot and 20 per cent. ad valorem in addition, which rate has not been changed since, but remains the law to this day. And for the past eleven years under this tariff the Government has received on an average annually the sum of $281,910 revenue from the importation of unmanufactured marble, while our own productions and manufactures have increased a hundred-fold.

This is the class of marble upon which it is proposed to reduce the duty from the present rate to 40 cents per cubic foot. The result could be none other than to shut up our own quarries, stop our mills, transfer our workshops to Italy, and vastly decrease our revenue.

The committee have fallen into a grave error in treating marble in blocks as raw material. The duty on blocks was not in the nature of a duty on raw material. Eighty-five per cent. of the cost of American block-marble is manual labor, 10 per cent. for capital and machinery employed in quarrying, and not more than 5 per cent. is for the value of the marble in the ledge. If the duty on any class was to be cut down it should have been upon sawed marble, as the actual labor employed in quarrying a given number of feet of marble is more than three times that employed in sawing the same number of feet. But the committee have pursued the opposite course, and for the purpose of taking care of the few men in New York and one or two other cities who import marble in the block and saw it, they have fixed the rate of duty on sawed marble about three times higher than on blocks. The importation of foreign marble is mainly in the hands of two Italian firms in New York City, who employ no labor in this country and are only interested in the foreign production at the low prices of Italian labor. Thus it will be seen that the duty on marble blocks is in the nature of protection to American labor, while the protection given by a high rate of duty to sawed marble is upon capital invested in mills and machinery. A marble quarry producing one hundred thousand cubic feet of marble per year would employ about two hundred and fifty men, while fifty men would be an ample force to saw the same amount.

It is said by the friends of this bill that our Vermont marble does not come in competition with the imported article. This is a great mistake. Every foot of veined Italian marble brought to this country takes the place of so much of our higher-priced production. The veined Italian marble is uniform and even in character, color, and value, seldom varying in price more than twenty or thirty cents per cubic foot, while ours is uneven in character and color, varying in price from fifty cents to $3 per cubic foot. It is, perhaps, on an average, the best one-third of our marble that comes in competition with the Italian, but we have to quarry the whole deposit together; so we have to produce a great quantity of marble that does not pay the cost of production in order to get what does. In this way the protection we get from the tariff is really on only about one-third of the marble we produce, the other two-thirds being sold often at a very low figure.

We have invested in the marble business in this country from ten to fifteen millions of dollars, giving employment to more than a half million of men. It is an important industry and is entitled to the consideration of Congress. It is for the interest and benefit of the whole country that it should be protected.

If foreign importers can bring marble from Italy as ballast for ships and undersell our own producers, who are compelled to pay large wages to labor and high transportation in our own markets, then the principle of self-preservation demands that we should establish and maintain "that degree of protection which will best secure and advance the prosperity of our own country" and guard the rights of our own people.

The men engaged in the production of marble in my State are enterprising, energetic men. They have made large investments in the business; they are continually extending their operations, increasing the number of laborers, and, notwithstanding the competition they now meet in the cheap labor of Italy and the cheap transportation of marble from the Italian ports to our markets, yet they can, under the present tariff, keep their quarries and mills in operation and after paying expenses have a small margin left for profits.

I have already shown that most of the revenue which is collected upon marble is upon that which is imported in the block or rough; and also that 85 per cent. of the cost of block marble is manual labor, and that to protect the producer of blocks is to protect American labor.

I will now demonstrate by figures that the present bill is unequal and unfair, that it discriminates in the most outrageous manner in favor of the importer and sawyer and against the producer of blocks, and that the marble interests of Vermont are to be sacrificed for the benefit of a few men who are fortunate enough to live in the district represented by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

For illustration, suppose we now take a block of marble containing one hundred cubic feet. That under the duty of 40 cents per cubic foot, as provided by this bill, would yield a net revenue to the Government, if imported in the block, of $40.

Now, suppose the importer saws that block into slabs of one inch in thickness and imports the slabs, he will then have 1,000 superficial feet of slab marble, upon which the duty by this bill is 12 cents per square foot, which will yield a revenue to the Government of one hundred and twenty dollars instead of forty if imported in the block. If the slabs are more than one inch in thickness 10 cents per square foot, in addition to the 12 cents, are put on for each inch or fraction of an inch in excess of one. So, if he sawed his block into two-inch slabs, he would have to pay duty on 500 square feet, which at 22 cents (the 12 cents and the 10 in addition for the extra inch) would cost him $110.

That the House and the country may see how beautifully this tariff bill would work in the interest of our New York friends and against my constituents, I will have printed with my remarks the following table which I have made. A block of marble containing 100 cubic feet would give, by the specific tax of 40 cents per cubic foot, $40.

If this block was sawed into slabs say—

	Number of square feet when sawed.	Duty on each square foot.	Net revenue to the Government.
		Cents.
1 inch thick	1,000	12	$120 00
2 inches thick	500	22	110 00
3 inches thick	333⅓	32	106 66
4 inches thick	250	42	105 00
5 inches thick	200	52	104 00
6 inches thick	166⅔	62	103 32
7 inches thick	142⅞	72	102 84
9 inches thick	111⅛	92	102 22

A single glance at the foregoing table will satisfy any man that under the provisions of this bill every foot of marble imported into this country would be in the block, our markets would be flooded with the foreign production, while our own quarries would be closed, the laborers idle, and the men who have invested their money in this useful and growing industry would be driven into bankruptcy and ruin.

What the marble producers of this country want and demand, therefore, is that the present tariff shall be allowed to stand, that Congress shall dismiss the subject at once, and they be permitted to pursue this important and useful industry in peace and without fear of the New York importers or foreign producers.

SLATE.

The slate interest, in which my people are also deeply interested, failed, as it seems, to catch the attention of the committee who reported this bill.

There are in the county in which I reside and in the adjoining county, in New York, now open and in operation nearly one hundred slate quarries. They employ directly and indirectly in that business upward of two thousand men, with an invested capital of more than $4,000,000. The production of roofing and all other kinds of slate amounts to over $1,000,000 annually.

The present law levies a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem on all slates, slate-pencils, slate chimney-pieces, mantels, slabs for tables, and all other manufactures of slate; and on roofing-slates 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The committee have seen fit to put all these several manufactures of slate upon the free list.

Now, sir, I am informed by two very intelligent and worthy gentlemen, who reside in the immediate vicinity of these slate quarries and who are thoroughly informed as to the whole matter, that the producers of this article are compelled to compete in our own markets with slate which is imported from Wales as ballast in ships, and which is quarried and put on shipboard in that country at one-third of the cost that is required to quarry it here.

The men who are engaged in the importation of slate reside, most of them, as I am informed, in the city of New York. It is for their interest to have slate come in free, and the committee, or a majority of them, have concluded to sacrifice our own producers in Vermont, New York, Maine, and Pennsylvania for the benefit of a few men who happen to be the neighbors of the chairman of the committee.

In the name of the men whose capital and daily bread are involved and put to the hazard in this proposed outrage I protest against it, and hope that the law will remain as it is and that they will be permitted to prosecute this important industry under the protection now afforded them by the present tariff.

WOOL.

The wool interest of this country stands among the most important and valuable of our industries. Millions of dollars are invested in it and thousands of our people are engaged in its production and manufacture. Unlike all other industries which are confined by nature to some particular locality, it is capable of being extended into every State and Territory and may be made profitable wherever civilization is pushed or the homes of our race are established.

The wool-growers and wool-manufacturers of this country are among the most energetic, intelligent, and patriotic men in our communities. They are entitled to the respect and courtesy of all classes and associations of men, even if it should chance to be the honorable Committee of Ways and Means of this House. They are men who are awake to the commercial interests of the country and the welfare of their fellow-men. As soon, therefore, as they came to know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] and his importing neighbors had determined to make a blind assault upon the tariff they came here and asked to be heard before the committee.

It would certainly seem to any fair-minded man that if the committee had desired knowledge and information upon this delicate and intricate subject they would have welcomed these men to their committee-room and been not only willing but anxious to learn of those whose thorough study and long practical experience so eminently qualify them to teach what the committee so much needed to know. But, strange to say, the very reverse of this was true; these men were told to depart, and when the committee had a more convenient season they would send for them. The doors were closed, and the country beheld the spectacle of a committee shutting themselves up in a room, isolated from all knowledge, cut off from all information, attempting as it would seem in a spirit of blindness and folly to revise a law involving nearly every industrial interest in the country and the welfare of this great people. Sir, we have the result of their labors before us: a combination of absurdities; a tissue of inconsistencies; a premature birth—

> "A thing that is curtailed of its fair proportions;
> Cheated of feature by dissembling man;
> Deformed, unfinished, sent before its time
> Into this House, scarce half made up."

It was wonderful in its conception, miraculous in its birth, and is worthy the fame of its illustrious sire.

It only remains for the people, whose petitions have been treated with scorn and whose rights have been violated and trodden in the dust, to arise in their might, strangle this unnatural production in the very arms of its sponsors, and restore hope and confidence to the anxious, waiting industries of the country.

There is no rule in political economy better supported by reason and backed by authority than the one that all raw materials which do not come in competition with the home industries of our country should be admitted free of duty, and on such as do compete and are of national importance duties should be imposed. The indigenous resources of our country are almost boundless, and our prosperity will be enhanced in proportion as we faithfully and wisely utilize all these resources; and if customs duties are necessary to enable the producers of raw materials in this country to compete successfully with similar producers in foreign countries, sound statesmanship and self-preservation demand that we should put them on.

We have in this country at the present time nearly 35,000,000 sheep, whose fleeces furnish 90 per cent. of all the wool consumed in our factories.

England is the only country that raises long, coarse wools to any considerable extent, consequently she meets with no competition either in her own markets or the markets of the world, while we raise fine wool of the Merino type and our producers have to compete with most of the wool-producing countries in the world.

It has been truly said that "sheep husbandry is essential to industrial as well as national independence." For many years it had a very precarious existence in this country and never really flourished or assumed any considerable proportions until the enactment of the present tariff. The tariff of 1867 upon wool, being the same substantially as the one now in force, was the result of the joint efforts and agreement of the wool-growers and wool manufacturers of this country. It "places the wool manufacturer, so far as his relation to foreign competitors is concerned, on the same footing as though he received his wool duty free."

"On manufactures of wool it imposes a specific duty, equivalent to the amount of duty on the wool entering into such manufactures. It then adds a duty for revenue and protection the same as is imposed on manufactures of cotton and of iron, on the raw material of which no duty is needed or imposed."

This gives equal protection to the wool-grower and the wool-manufacturer, and under its operation the wool industry of the country in all its branches has been largely developed and increased.

In 1866 we imported wool as follows: from the Argentine Republic about 37,000,000 pounds, and from the Cape of Good Hope 8,000,000 pounds, making 45,000,000 in all.

In 1867 the present law was passed, fixing the duty upon foreign wool, and in 1868 we imported from the Argentine Republic and the Cape of Good Hope only six and one-half million pounds. And this 38,000,000 pounds thus shut out by operation of the tariff of 1867 was a class and grade of wool which competes with the wool we raise in this country. We shall observe the same good effects of the tariff of 1867 if we examine as to the production of wool in this country before and after the passage of that law. In 1866 we raised only 137,000,000 pounds, while in 1877 we raised 208,000,000 pounds.

In 1870 California only produced twenty-three and one-half million pounds of wool, while in 1876, under the fostering influences of the present tariff, she raised 51,000,000 pounds.

In 1866, under a low tariff, we imported 36,760 bales of wool from South America alone; in 1867, under the present tariff, we imported only 6,683 bales, the balance used by us being supplied from our own flocks.

My time will only permit me merely to call attention to this point and one or two facts connected with it; but the figures I have given not only show a vast increase in the production of domestic wools within the past few years, but they also serve to illustrate the beneficial effects of a protective tariff upon this great and growing industry as fully and completely as though I should spend hours in argument and multiply figures in regard to it.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent is essentially and pre-eminently an agricultural State.

Her people are largely engaged in farming and her chief productions are from the dairy and sheep-husbandry.

For the excellence and superiority of these productions, as well as fine horses and cattle, Vermont has been deservedly famous for many years.

In the county of Addison, in my district, are some of the finest and most valuable sheep in the world; in fact, I may almost say they are perfect sheep.

These sheep have been brought to their present standard of excellence and perfection by the careful mixing of the very best blood of this and foreign countries and cross-breeding them.

Their best blood came originally from the old Spanish Merino sheep, but so rapid was their advancement, under the care and skillful management of Jarvis, Hammond, and their successors, that the name of Spanish was long ago dropped and they were christined American Merinos, which proud name they bear to this day. These sheep will yield a fleece weighing from fifteen to eighteen pounds on the average, and a ram of this breed will double the yield of wool in an ordinary flock in one year. These sheep are raised in Vermont and sent into every State and Territory in the Union to improve the flocks, increase the production, and enhance the price of this valuable staple.

If sheep-husbandry is kept up and encouraged in this country by wise legislation, Vermont will find a ready market not only for her wool, but also for her surplus sheep, and the whole country will be benefited; but if it is allowed to go down, either by the neglect or folly of Congress, or unwise laws, my constituents will suffer and the people everywhere will be the losers.

The farmers of my State who own these valuable sheep, and the owners of flocks throughout the country, have invested their money in them under the promise of the Government, embodied in the present law, that they should be guarded and protected in their business.

Under the present law the wool-growers and wool-manufacturers have to some extent prospered and been enabled to increase their investments and extend their business of which the Government as well as the whole people are now reaping the benefit. They have asked for no change and they demand no additional legislation, but they do protest, in the most earnest manner, against the willful destruction of this great and growing industry, and their own bankruptcy, which is now threatened by the passage of this bill.

Pass this bill and the fool need not be told that it will inevitably ruin the wool industry of this country and transfer our flocks as well as our mills and factories to foreign shores and compel us to surrender our home market to our commercial rivals and enemies.

This bill proposes to cut down and reduce the present tariff on merino wool, such as is raised by the people of this country, a very large per cent. and very largely reduce that on all other grades and classes of wool. We need hardly stop to calculate the effects of such unwise and ruinous legislation upon not only the wool interest of the country but upon business generally. It would stop sheep-breeding in Vermont, and cast a dark shadow of fear and discouragement over the men who are now engaged in filling the rich pastures of Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and California with the choicest breeds from the golden flocks of the Green Mountains.

A single other item in this bill representing the wool interest, and I then leave it to the judgment and good sense of this House and the country to decide whether my position is sound, and whether I am justified in what I have said respecting it. The duty upon all woolen cloths is fixed by the committee in this bill at 50 per cent. ad valorem, while on ready-made woolen clothing it is put at 45 per cent. ad valorem. Do you ask me what effect this will have upon the business of manufacturing clothing in this country? Why, sir, the child and the idiot need not be told that it will remove our clothing workshops and factories to England, France, and Germany, and throw out of employment a half million of men and women whose daily support is now drawn from that source.

And, sir, the worst feature of this wholesale destruction of our present tariff is that under a low tariff our producers and manufacturers, in order to compete with the cheap labor, cheap capital and low rates of interest of foreign countries, will be compelled to reduce the wages of our operatives to the starvation standard of Italy, Wales, and England, by which labor will be left ultimately to receive the shock and bear the weight of this terrible blow.

CONCLUSION.

Notwithstanding the vast expenses and terrible sacrifices of the war, no man will for a moment claim or pretend that there has ever been any other period in the history of this Government when every material industry of the country grew and expanded as they did from 1860 down to 1873.

When the war broke out we were destitute of everything necessary to carry it on, except men and women and patriotism and pluck. We were without arms, ammunition, equipments, clothing, money, or credit. When the war closed we had the best armed, clothed, and equipped Army that ever stood in line of battle; our population had vastly increased; we had doubled up our wealth, expanded our manufactures, and our credit was unbounded. This wondrous change and advancement, although stimulated in some degree by other causes, was brought about mainly through the agency of our high protective tariffs.

When our people were, by the necessities arising out of the war, driven back upon their own resources, Congress at once adopted a measure of high protection, which immediately created a vast number and variety of manufactures, and they in turn raised the price of labor and raw material, stimulated production, opened a home market for all our surplus products, and sent a thrill of life and vigor through every branch of business and avenue of our industries.

In this case of course the expansion was in some degree unhealthy, because the extraordinary demand was created by the war, which, when it ended, left many of our manufactures prostrate; but it nevertheless just as fully illustrated the benefits and advantages of the protective system as though it had all occurred during a time of profound peace.

We can best appreciate the national growth and prosperity under the great American system of protection by referring briefly to what has been wrought out and accomplished since 1861. In looking back over our history for the past sixteen years we find that, notwithstanding a rebellion unparalleled in fierceness and extent raged for four years in a portion of our country, we have gained during that time in population, by natural increase and immigration, at least 14,000,000; we have increased our manufacturing capital more than $30,000,000,000; we have added nearly $14,000,000,000 to the aggregate wealth of the nation; we have reduced the internal taxes of the people two hundred millions annually; we have paid in principal and interest on the public debt over $2,000,000,000; we have paid to our soldiers in pensions more than three hundred millions; we have reduced the customs duties sixty-millions annually; we have paid two hundred and fifty millions on claims growing out of the rebellion; we have abolished the income tax, never more, I trust, to be revived, and raised every bond ever issued by the Government and now outstanding to a premium in every market at home and abroad; we have reduced the interest on loans from 12 and 15 per cent. to 4 and 4½; we have reduced the current expenses of the Government every year except one from 1866 down to the present time, and to-day, if it was not for the bringing in of this bill, the funded loan of this country would be quoted at from ½ to ¾ of 1 per cent. premium in every money market in the world.

In addition to this, we have cut down the forests and plowed up the prairies; we have lightened the burdens of the toiling, struggling millions and filled the world with our inventions; we have built school-houses in every valley and upon every hill-side; we have erected churches in every village and hamlet; we have touched the banks of every lake and river with the magic wand of our mighty progress, and behold villages and cities have at once sprung up, filled with a brave, intelligent, and industrious people, and echoing the rattle of machinery and the hum of honest industry; amid the fiery flames of civil war we have cemented anew the bond of our Federal Union with untold treasures and the blood of a million brave men; we have broken down the red Moloch of war between nations and erected upon its ruins the throne of justice and the golden scepter of peaceful arbitration; we have tunneled the ocean with wires, annihilated space and time, and filled the world with wonder and knowledge; we have ascended on high, plucked the lightning from the clouds, chained it to the chariot wheels of our progress, and made it the servant of genius and science; we have dived into the bowels of the earth, unlocked the secrets of nature and compelled them to minister to our comfort, our knowledge, and our progress; we have crystallized the great principles of liberty, justice, and equality, and burned them into the organic law of the Republic; we possess the only free government in the world, and enjoy more real happiness than any other nation on earth. Such is the history of our country under the beneficent influence of a protective tariff.

We stand to-day "upon the dividing line between the centuries, looking back through one hundred years, with all their grand achievements, and forward to the illimitable future, with all its magnificent possibilities."

To the patriot statesmen of America is committed the high and holy duty of so directing the course of the Republic by wise and judicious legislation in the future that the hopes and aspirations of mankind may be fully realized and that her grand and noble destiny may be fulfilled. As in the past, so in the future the road to national honor and national progress and prosperity will lie in the protection of our own industries and in the defense of our own people.

THE NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th of October, 1877, I introduced into the House the following bill:

A bill to repeal so much of the internal-revenue law as requires persons and State banking associations to pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating issue of any State bank, and to enforce a uniform rate of interest throughout the United States, and to punish national banks for accepting a usurious rate of interest.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That section 3412 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which requires State banks to pay 10 per cent. on their circulating issue be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That section 5198 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended as follows: After the word "entire," in line 3 of said section, insert the word "debt," and after which the word "and;" so that the act shall read "entire debt and interest."

SEC. 3. That no person or persons, corporation or association, shall hereafter, within the United States, take, receive, reserve, or charge, directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent. per annum, which may be taken in advance for periods of three months or over, for the sale, use, hire, loan, or discount of money, whether it be gold, silver, or currency, or upon any promissory note of hand, book account, or in any other manner; and every person or persons who shall knowingly demand, receive, reserve, or charge, directly or indirectly, a rate of interest greater than is provided as aforesaid, for any purpose whatever, except as interest on county, State, and Government bonds, shall forfeit the entire debt upon which the interest is demanded and claimed, principal and interest, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any State court within the States and in the United States courts within the Territories and the District of Columbia, shall be fined not less than $100 and imprisoned not less than six months, at the discretion of the court trying the case. This act shall be so construed as to include corporations and associations as "persons," and the officers, agents, or attorneys of corporations and associations shall be dealt with as "persons."

This bill, it will be seen, proposes legislation on two subjects, namely, the repeal of the 10 per cent. tax on the issues of State banks and to fix the rate of interest throughout the United States at 6 per cent. I shall address myself at present to the first subject mentioned.

Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people expect relief from this Congress. The people did not send us here to pass appropriations alone. The almost unparalleled suffering and even want in the land call loudly to our patriotism and our sense of duty.

The attempt to rush through Congress only appropriation bills and then hurry away will not meet the expectations of the country. Neither will the mere reduction of expenditures meet the demands of the times. Reduction of taxes and a sufficiency of currency to meet the needs of the people and to enable them to bear the burdens laid upon them are what is looked for with prayers, anxieties, and even tears. Shall they be disappointed? God forbid! The chosen representatives of the land should rise to the solemn issues of the hour and gird themselves like men to the great and glorious work of giving relief to distress and bread to poverty. The piercing cry of hard times has sounded sadly in our ears. The poor have sighed—

> Many days you have lingered around our cabin door;
> Oh, hard times come again no more.

Beyond this and above this has been heard the fearful shout of bread or blood, reminding one of the dark days in Paris, when her laboring masses were starving.

A grave and serious question arises. What has caused this depression in trade, this shrinkage in values, this closing of work-shops, the long list of failures, and the appalling want in the country? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is owing to faulty and in many instances, I fear, corrupt legislation. The legislation for sixteen years or more has been too often in favor of the rich and powerful to the detriment of the weak and poor. The bondholder has rolled in his wealth, free from taxation, and the laboring-man has been taxed in his poverty upon nearly everything he eats and wears. The cry of these toiling and suffering millions, "How long, O, Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that" oppress us? shall be heard, if not by men, by the Great Father.

Let us examine some of this legislation. The internal-revenue law of the United States imposes a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of notes issued by any State bank. This act was passed March 3, 1865, and reads as follows:

That every national-banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association paid out after the 1st day of July, 1866.

Prior to this time, however, namely, on the 30th June, 1864, Congress passed an act taxing the circulation of State bank-notes 1 per cent. payable in installments of one-twelfth of 1 per cent. per month. The real object in passing these acts was not for the purpose of raising revenue (although the acts so profess) but to tax out of existence all State banking associations and to deprive the several States of the privilege so long enjoyed of furnishing a ready medium of exchange for the people. These acts had the desired result, for there is scarcely any State banks of issue now in existence.

Now, in order to show the objects and effects of these arbitrary acts of Congress, I wish to set forth the amount of State bank circulation and the resources of the same at the beginning of this high-handed effort to destroy the rights of the people and to contribute to the interest of a then rising, unscrupulous monopoly under the name and style of the national-banking system:

It appears in a report on the finances (Executive Documents Nos. 2 and 3, first session, Thirty-eighth Congress) that in 1863 there were fourteen hundred and sixty-six State banks and branches, the liabilities of which were, including capital, in the aggregate $1,191,749,945, and their total resources $1,185,491,728. In the same year the circulation and deposits of these banks were $632,363,444 and the aggregate amount of specie $101,227,369, or about $1 of specie for $6 of circulation and deposits, and, including other liabilities, about $1 in specie to $7 of liability. The proportion of specie to circulation and deposits, and also to other liabilities, is very nearly the same for the years intervening between 1851 and 1863.

Under these State banking associations the people of the United States had advanced for over two-thirds of a century in all the elements of prosperity, which tended to make us the greatest nation upon earth, and each of the several States was vying with each other in the rapid progress in all that pertained to its happiness and prosperity. Our people had all the money needed for the legitimate business of the country. The rates of interest were from 4 to 6 per cent., and the lands of our farmers were always considered as good security, while now nothing but United States bonds will give a man credit at any of the banking counters of the land. If the farmer wishes to discount a note for $1,000 and offers the finest lands in the whole country as security, he is told that the price of lands is too uncertain, you must give us United States bonds, or city acceptances, based generally upon the same.

The issues of these State banks were often (almost if not quite) at par with gold within the States where they had their charters, and many of these issues were greedily taken by most of the other States, and when they were at a discount it was so small that it produced but little inconvenience to the people.

We all remember, especially in the Southern and Middle States, how delighted our farmers were to sell their horses, hogs, cattle, bacon, and flour for the bank-bills of South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Virginia, and other States. Most of these banks were upon the most solid foundation; they were perfectly solvent; most all of the surplus capital in the country was vested in these banks, and the management was generally under the most wealthy people and those possessing the greatest financial skill of the country.

Indeed, such was the confidence in these banks that some of their issues were worth 50, 75, and even 100 per cent. after the termination of the war.

As a matter of course there were the exceptional instances of what is sometimes called a "wild-cat bank," but this was always the result of some fraudulent procurement of bank charters being obtained from the Legislatures. We have a few instances of the courts declaring a bank charter void upon the grounds that the charter was rushed through the Legislature under some false pretense and by fraud.

But these were but rare and exceptional instances which sink into insignificance compared with the gigantic frauds of the present day. In those good old days, now and then, a sharp trickster would get himself elected to the Legislature, and under the disguise of a favorite name or some popular policy would smuggle a bank charter through without those safeguards necessary to insure the people against imposition; but there is no instance of that audacity which would now demonetize silver and change existing contracts with the bondholders so as to wrench from an unwilling and over-taxed people these debts in gold, to obtain which there has come shrinkage, panic, distress, poverty, and universal stagnation.

It will be seen that these State banks had about one dollar in specie to six of circulation and deposits; and this amount of specie was always considered enough to maintain the par value of these notes. With this amount of specie the State banks were all considered at a specie-basis standard, and it required no forced act of resumption to compel them to resume specie payments.

The present Secretary of the Treasury in his recent report contends that the national banks can readily resume specie payment by the 1st of January, 1879, although it appears from the same report that the ratio of specie held by the national banks to their circulation and deposits for the last ten years has been 14.5 per cent. The State banks did much better. From 1835 to 1842 the State banks had specie 11.3; from 1850 to 1858, 9.6 per cent. So that if the fact that the old State banks did not have specie in a sufficient amount to warrant specie payment if a sudden run was made upon them is an argument against their existence, then the argument is greater against the national banks, because they have much less. And many of the people perhaps will be surprised to learn that the depositors of these national banks have no security whatever beyond the personal honor of the stockholders, or possibly a liability to the amount of stock of each individual stockholder, but certainly no sufficient security. But I shall allude to this point again.

But I wish to call the attention of the country to the dates of these enactments, in order to show the motives of this extraordinary assumption on the part of Congress of the rights of the people. It is a familiar quotation from Chief-Justice Marshall that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." Certainly in this instance the taxing power has resulted in the destruction of all the State banks in the nation, greatly to the detriment and damage of the people. Some of our people think the State banks were destroyed by the war, but such is not the case entirely. This great taxing power laid its destructive hand upon these institutions long before the ravages of war had run their course; and while a terrible and devastating war was rapidly crippling the resources of the country and spreading ruin and misery over the land, the moneyed rings of the country became the pet monopolies of Congress, and on the 23d of February, 1863, the national banking system sprung into existence. Then followed in 1864 and 1865 these acts of taxation; then came this power of destruction—this taxing power—acting in greedy co-operation with the grim monster war.

To show this, I present the following tabulated statement from the report of the Comptroller of the Treasury, showing the amount of Federal taxation upon these State banks from 1864 to 1877. For this table I am indebted to the able speech on this subject recently made, I believe, in the Legislature of Virginia, by Major John W. Daniel, of Lynchburgh, Virginia; and I may avail myself further along with other important ideas obtained from this great speech:

It will thus be seen how completely the State banks were taxed out of existence; but not until after a severe struggle of twelve years, during which time the enormous sum of $56,827,770.27 was paid by way of Federal taxation! Say you, sir, that these State banks were powerless for good? Say you that they had not the ability and will to supply the country with a medium of exchange? Say you that such gigantic energies involved in the grappling with the monopolizing competitor, the national banks, even while the country was reeling under the shock of terrible war, are not a guarantee of fidelity and business capabilities?

And pray look what an unequal contest. While the circulation of the State banks is taxed 10 per cent. the national-bank circulation is only taxed 1 per cent., and every national bank in the land is now howling for the repeal of this 1 per cent. tax. Yes, this national-bank monopoly having driven all competition out of the land, now demands further exclusive privileges. They complain vociferously at both Federal and State taxation, and I believe the Secretary of the Treasury in his last report comes to their relief and urges the same thing in their behalf.

No wonder these national-bank monopolies can refuse to loan money at less than 12 to 40 per cent., because they have no competition in the line of dealing in money; and these banks have now almost complete control of the money market. They have driven all competition out of the way, except now and then a bank of discount and deposit acting under State authority. And by false colors and fraud, in many instances, they have obtained bills discounted for which the bank is not liable, and gathered in nearly all the surplus money of the country in the way of deposits for which the creditors have no security whatever.

Now, at this point, for fear I may do injustice to some of these banks, I call attention to the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the last fiscal year. The Secretary is quite careful to argue to the country that the notes of these banks are good, and that they can pay the notes, in specie if demanded, after the 1st day of January, 1879; but he never says to the people that they have adequate and complete security for the deposits, amounting, as he shows, to the vast sum of $768,245,746, which is a greater sum than the circulation and deposits, added together, of all the fourteen hundred State banks in existence in 1863. This national-banking act of February 25, 1863, has brought into existence twenty-three hundred and seventy-two national banks, two thousand and seventy-eight of which were in operation June 22, 1877. (See report of the Secretary of the Treasury, pages 128 and 129.)

Now, I wish to call the special attention of the country to a few facts in regard to these national banks which I believe are not generally known by the people. In the first place it is admitted that the notes of these national banks are secured—that the deposit of United States bonds with the Treasury secures the noteholders, but, as I have before shown, the depositor has no security. Look at this vast sum of over seven hundred and sixty millions of deposits in these banks on June 22, 1877, for which there is no security.

And to prove the want of security the report of Secretary Sherman shows that since the "date of the national-banking system to June 1, 1877, fifty-five of these banks have failed with an aggregate capital of $10,875,100." (See Report, Message, and Documents, page 169.)

The same report shows that the amount of creditors' claims proven against these failing national banks was $17,899,886; and the Secretary says "the total loss to the creditors of these banks is estimated at $5,525,000."

Several of these banks paid as low as 7, 8, and 10 per cent. only of the claims of creditors. The Secretary of the Treasury, while defending this national-bank system, recommends further legislation to prevent what he calls "malfeasance" or "crime." These banks have not only held out inducements to the people to make a deposit of all their surplus money with them and then squandered the same to the amount of many millions, as appears from official sources, but they have been guilty in many instances of "malfeasance" and "crime." Here is what Secretary Sherman says in his report for the last fiscal year. (See Message and Documents, page 169.)

> The most fruitful cause of the failure of national banks has been the unlawful use of the funds or credits of these associations by their officers and directors. In most instances these persons have accomplished this malfeasance or crime by obtaining, in their official capacity, the discount of notes in which the bank had no interest. The receivers of six different banks which have recently failed have declined to allow claims for discounted paper bearing the indorsement of the bank upon the ground that the claimant had good and sufficient notice that such paper was discounted for the benefit of individuals and not of the bank. The passage of an act prohibiting a bank from borrowing money upon its own obligation or from loaning its credit is recommended; and it is also suggested that an act prohibiting any bank from obtaining rediscounts upon its own bills receivable, unless authorized by its board of directors under the seal of the bank, would have the effect to put other banks upon their guard when applied to for such favors.

Let us see for a moment the practical workings of these national banks. Recollect that these banks are based entirely upon United States bonds. For instance, if an association of persons desire to start a national bank they must come to Washington or New York and purchase $100,000 in United States bonds. The law then requires these to be deposited with the Treasury Department as a security for the redemption of the notes to be issued. But the law only allows these associations of persons to issue 90 per cent. of the amount of the bonds so deposited; that is to say, having paid out $100,000 they are allowed to issue $90,000 of their notes. Here, then, is $10,000 more currency taken from the country and locked up in this bond investment than is returned to the country. Upon this point I will quote an excellent argument which I find in the Raleigh Observer of September 9, 1877. It says, in reference to North Carolina:

> We now call the attention of our readers to the loss of currency our State, as a whole, sustains by having this system instead of that in which the basis of the banks shall be gold and silver instead of paper.
> There are fifteen national banks in the State, with an aggregate capital of $2,556,000, namely:

	Capital.
Wilmington banks	$250,000
Raleigh banks	600,000
Charlotte banks	900,000
New Berne banks	100,000
Salem banks	100,000
Greensborough banks	150,000
Winston banks	51,000
Wilson banks	55,000
Fayetteville banks	350,000
Total fifteen banks	2,556,000

> The aggregate bonds deposited in Washington to secure circulation are $1,606,100, which cost probably at least $1,750,000.
> The total currency received in exchange for all this money is only, say, $1,450,000;

so that the State has lost, say, $300,000 in currency by the establishment of these banks.

Now, supposing these bonds were exchanged for gold, as they could be easily, and supposing that the banks could issue $3 in notes for $1 in specie in the vaults, as was considered safe under the old system, then they could lend to our people, if good security should be offered, as much as, say, $4,500,000.

I cannot do better than to further quote from the same article in the Observer as a part of my argument:

We have heretofore shown with regard to the national-banking system that it is liable to several insuperable objections, as applicable to communities like our own, which have little accumulated capital. These objections in substance are:

First. That as the basis of the banks is United States bonds and as those bonds must be bought in a distant market, the money sent away to buy the bonds is more than the currency brought back. We showed, for example, that Raleigh, with $600,000 banking capital, had sent out of the State $120,000 more currency than the banks were able to issue, and that Raleigh had lost by such establishment of banks that amount of money.

Second. That, this being the case, the banks, in order to pay necessary expenses of offices, rents, taxes, &c., must charge high rate of interest.

We showed that if the banks were founded on gold and silver, instead of United States bonds, they could issue two or three times as much as they do now and could therefore charge one-half or one-third the rate of interest.

Third. It follows that the much-talked-of "new distribution of currency," "withdrawing currency" from New England, New York, &c., so as to allow the West and the South to establish new banks, modern "free banking" as it is called, are delusive mockeries, because in order to avail themselves of the privilege the West and South must send to those places for purchase of bonds more currency than they obtain. The West and the South have been deluded by the smart capitalists of the North and Northeast, and the members of Congress, whom they control, into the belief that they were gaining something, when in reality they were losing enormously.

The result of this oppressive system is that currency is taken from the poor communities and piled up on the rich; that money cannot be had where it is needed; that all industry and enterprise are stifled; that debtors are at the mercy of creditors; that often money cannot be borrowed in sections of the country where it is wanted at even the most enormous rates of interest, and that prudent men are deterred from business enterprises, because at certain seasons, even when no panic is existing, they cannot be sure of obtaining bank accommodations at any price.

These national banks are not adapted to an agricultural locality and do not afford the monetary conveniences which the people in these localities demand. And on this point I will use an extract from a speech made some months ago in the city of New York by W. L. Trentholm, esq., of Charleston, South Carolina, a man of enlarged experience in commercial transactions and whose opinion is worth much on a question of finance. Speaking of the national-bank system, he says:

The settlement of the currency question and the reform of the national-bank act are of vital importance to the South, as well as other sections. If any one class in this country is likely to gain more than others by resumption it will be the cotton-growers, for much the largest part of their product is actually sold abroad for gold, and the expense of converting that gold into the currency which they have been content to take comes, like all commercial charges, off the prices realized by the producer. With gold about to be restored to its functions as the basis of bank-note circulation, the country banks, especially in the South and the Northwest, should be at once emancipated from the fetters of the national-bank act by the repeal of the 10 per cent. tax upon circulation.

The effect of this enactment upon the purely agricultural communities of the country seems to have been but little attended to. Hence, if after discussion it should appear that the views here presented are correct, the needful remedy should be sought not by or for the South alone. Money capital at the South has never been abundant, but before the war there were many banks there which enjoyed wide and well-deserved credit, and which were thus able to supply the circulation required.

The Scotch banks of issue seem to have furnished the type for the southern banks, and similarity of circumstance produced a like success in both places. Under the system of banking referred to, the banks issued their demand notes in exchange for the time notes discounted or the exchange purchased, upon a calculation that the currency requirements of the community would keep these notes in circulation a longer or shorter time. A reserve of about 33 per cent. was held in coin to meet such calls for redemption as might occur. This exchange of corporate for private credit is entirely legitimate and sound. Whatever risk there is in it is covered by the capital of the bank. It is in effect a system of credit mutual insurance. Such banks of issue are especially necessary in agricultural communities, because there money capital is always scarce; and they are especially successful in such communities, because agricultural pursuits are not speculative. Every man's condition is easily and accurately known, his ability to pay is assured by the visible progress of his crop toward maturity, and the use he makes of the money borrowed is necessarily patent. Hence the prudent conduct of such a bank is a matter of will only. The way is plain. Not only are such banks peculiarly adapted to agricultural communities, but no other banks are suited to their needs. All agriculturists are presumed to have their capital invested in lands, animals, and other adjuncts of the farm, and they only need money to defray the expenses of making the crop. It is quite as legitimate in a farmer to borrow money for this purpose from a bank as it is in a city contractor or a manufacturer to borrow the means to complete a contract. There is, however, this difference: that all the contractors in a city do not want to borrow simultaneously nor for the same period, whereas the wants of all the farmers in a county are alike; whence it results that a small amount of money goes the rounds of the contractors and accommodates all, but the farmers borrow together and pay back together. There is another difference: the money lent in a city to A returns into bank in the shape of deposits by B, C, and D, whereas money that goes into the country passes from hand to hand and performs a circuit before it is again deposited.

It will now appear why national banks are not adapted to the needs of agricultural communities, and why especially they have not been established generally at the South. These banks are admirably contrived to meet the requirements of communities where industry is varied, trade active, and speculation lively; the safeguards thrown around them by the law are not only important in securing prudent administration, but they encourage and attract deposits, and thus utilize the whole money of the community. The circulation they emit is a profitable privilege. It is not a convenience to the public. On the contrary, for every $80 of circulation $100 has been locked up in a Government bond. A national bank starting with $1,000,000 in cash gets but $800,000 effective circulation—a loss of $200,000 of currency to the community, unless the bonds happen to have been bought there. In agricultural communities, on the other hand, where there are no deposits to be attracted, and where money capital is scarce, but where currency is needed at certain times and for certain seasons and purposes only, national banks are out of place. They reduce the currency, as has been seen; they have no elasticity of circulation, they depend upon deposits, and therefore are disqualified for making the only sort of loans a farmer needs—loans payable after harvest.

Now, be it remembered that these bonds used as a basis for these national-bank monopolies draw interest which is paid semi-annually in gold to these same bankers. The amount of bonds now owned by the national banks, and on deposit with the Treasurer for the redemption of their notes, is $343,048,900. The interest on this sum at 6 per cent. is annually $21,240,000.

So it will appear that in order to keep up these banks the Government of the United States becomes a debtor to them in this vast sum of more than three hundred and fifty millions, on which we pay annually the enormous sum of over twenty-one millions as interest to these bank monopolies.

And as the law now stands this amount of indebtedness to these bankers can be increased to a considerable extent as they may desire. The act of January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, changed the law which limited the amount of national-bank circulation to three hundred and fifty-four millions, and provides for the retirement or contracting of the legal-tender notes until the amount shall be reduced to $300,000,000. And the amount of the legal-tender or greenback circulation which is "called in" is given to the national banks with the additional sum of 20 per cent. on that amount. That is to say, if $100 is issued to the national banks $80 of that amount is withdrawn from the legal-tender circulation.

The effect of which is the Government is to have in circulation $300,000,000 and all the balance of the currency to be used in this country is to be controlled by the national banks; and as these vast sums are issued to these banks the national debt increases with the greatly increased burden of interest. Who can say that this is not a monopoly?

What is a monopoly? It is the taking away a right or privilege of the whole people and giving it to one man or a few men. What right has the Congress to say that the right to deal in bank-notes as a medium of exchange shall be taken from the people of the States and given to a few privileged corporations? One of the grievances against the King of Great Britain was the acts of Parliament saying that certain raw materials such as flax and cotton should not be manufactured in the colonies, but this privilege should be confined to the manufacturers of Great Britain. This was considered a cause for war. Charles I lost his head for the attempt to transfer all the business of England, from the making of horseshoe-nails to the highest work of art, from the people and give the same to the privileged few. These despotic acts of monopoly characterized the reigns of Elizabeth and Charles I, and have left a dark stigma upon those times which will go down to history with the brand of infamy.

In the case of the Veazie Bank vs. Tenno, (8 Wallace United States Reports, 533,) the question was made as to the constitutionality of this 10 per cent. tax on the State banks. And this decision being in 1869 and by a court greatly inclined to sustain the vast assumption of the legislative department of the Government, the majority of the court sustained the constitutionality of this act and give the following reason:

The necessity of adequate provision for the financial exigencies created by the rebellion, &c.

But Justices Nelson and DAVIS (the latter now a United States Senator) delivered a dissenting opinion, in which they said:

This taxation of the powers and faculties of the State government, which are essential to their sovereignty and to the efficient and independent management and administration of their internal affairs, is, for the first time, advanced as an attribute of Federal authority. It finds no support or countenance in the early history of the Government or in the opinions of illustrious statesmen who founded it. These statesmen scrupulously abstained from any encroachment upon the reserved rights of the States, and within these limits sustained and supported these sovereign States.

We say nothing as to the purpose of this heavy tax of 16 per cent. upon the banks, ten of which we cannot but regard as imposed upon the power of the States to create them. Indeed, the purpose is scarcely concealed in the opinion of the court, namely, to encourage the national banks. It is sufficient to add that the burden of the tax, while it has encouraged these banks, has proved fatal to those of the States; and if we are at liberty to judge of the purpose of an act from the consequences that have followed, it is not, perhaps, going too far to say that these consequences were intended.

And thus we see two of the judges of the Supreme Court denouncing this act as impolitic and unconstitutional. And the majority of the court only sustained it upon the grounds of a war measure. But if the war is over, why continue on the statute-book those odious enactments which were only intended as a war measure? On the return of peace, why not a return to some of the old laws and usages under which we all had grown prosperous?

Now, it might be asked why is this provision of the internal-revenue act retained on the statute-book if it yields no revenue? And what is the motive for taxing State banks of issue out of existence? Why this high-handed deprivation of a right so long enjoyed by the States in their sovereign capacity? Is it because the people of the States are incompetent to manage their own internal affairs? Is it because of the love and affection that the Government has for the people of the several States, in saving them of what is often alleged the danger in a system of State banks? I am inclined to think we can trace it to a different motive.

This act of Congress has brought into existence 2,372 of these national banks, 240 of which have been organized in the State of Massachusetts, 62 in the little State of Rhode Island, 335 in New York, 253 in the State of Pennsylvania. Now here are 890 of these privileged corporations in four States above mentioned, while there have been organized only 262 in all the Southern and Southwestern States including Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri. North Carolina has organized fifteen national banks with a capital stock of $2,601,000. The capital stock of all the Southern States herein mentioned only amounts to $42,115,500, while the capital stock of the banks within the four Northern States named amount to the vast sum of $268,431,831.

It will be seen that, whatever may be the cause, there is at this time a very unequal distribution of the capital of the country. If it is the result of unwise and discriminating legislation, let us hasten to modify or repeal the same. The national-banking act only allowed the issuance of $300,000,000 as the national-bank currency. This sum was increased to $350,000,000 by the act of July 12, 1870, and this was distributed under the act. Secretary Sherman says that most of the sum allowed to be issued to the national banks was taken up within six years from the original act in 1863. This being during and immediately after the war, the Southern States were not in a condition to avail themselves of this privilege. They had nothing with which to buy United States bonds. As will be seen, the Southern and Southwestern States have a little over forty-two millions invested in these national banks, but, as we have shown, to get these privileges the country has been depleted of $10,000 in currency on every $100,000. It would be much better for the Southern States especially, for this sum to be used in State banks, and in that way utilize all the currency as well as the gold and silver of the country.

The organization of the State banks would be a remedy for contraction. It may be asked what is contraction? To contract in this sense is to "draw in," to lessen. To contract the currency is to lessen the quantity in circulation. The business of the country and the demands of trade require always so much money, and this quantity always adapts itself to the various stages of business and progress of the country; so that an arbitrary attempt of the Government to contract the currency often results in ruin to the people. And this is the cause of our present troubles; this is the cause of such wide-spread distress in the country. The legislation of Congress in the interest of the moneyed power of the world has brought our people almost to the point of financial ruin, and even starvation itself. I maintain that, if the Government through its own selected financial agents attempts to supply the people with money, the amount of circulation should be adjusted to suit the demands of the times. Congress by the act of June 20, 1864, provided a mode of contracting the issues of these banks, and the result is thus shown: on December 1, 1874, there was in circulation of the issues of these national banks the sum of $352,394,346.

Now, see how this sum was decreased. The following shows the annual decrease since January 1, 1874, to November 1, 1877. (See Secretary of the Treasury's report:)

January 1, 1875	347,959,471
January 1, 1876	341,653,672
January 1, 1877	318,356,754
November 1, 1877	315,881,990

This report shows a decrease of national-bank circulation of over thirty-five millions since January 14, 1875, and that the decrease within the last year has been over four millions.

Then the act of 14th January, 1875, called the resumption act, provides for a contraction of the greenback circulation also, until the amount shall not exceed $300,000,000. Here is what Mr. Sherman, the Secretary of the Treasury, says:

> The Secretary further stated that in the preparations for resumption the volume of the United States notes had been reduced from $382,000,000 at the time the act was passed to $346,618,024 at present. The amount of outstanding bank-notes has also been reduced from $346,479,756, in 1875, to $321,989,991.

Then we have the startling facts that within the period of three years $34,000,000 of the national-bank issues have been withdrawn, and over $25,000,000 of the greenback currency have been withdrawn, making the grand aggregate of over fifty-nine millions of currency withdrawn from the business of the country.

Is it any wonder that we hear loud wails of distress throughout this broad land? Why this contraction? They say that all debts must be paid in gold after the 1st day of January, 1879, and as we have not got gold enough we must reduce the quantity of paper currency until the amount is so little that we can pay the same in gold. Then, as the volume is decreased, the gold dollar to the bondholder becomes more valuable, and in the same proportion does the price of property shrink, and ruin and stagnation in business are the result.

Look at the alarming scarcity of money throughout the country. Look at the shrinkage in the price of all property. Look at the millions of people thrown out of employment for the want of the legitimate use of capital in the many business departments of the country. Look out over this vast land, blessed with abundant rains, genial sunshine, with barns and granaries crowded with produce which can find no market. Remember now that all this legislation has been demanded by the bondholders and the money kings of the country, by which their invested capital is increased in value, but all the property of the debtor class depreciates and shrinks in value until it is impossible to obtain money to meet the demands upon the people.

Let this tax of 10 per cent. be removed, and let our State Legislatures provide for the utilization of the capital of the country and afford a medium of exchange for our people. Upon this point I quote again from Major Daniel's speech, whose sentiments I fully indorse:

> I am told that it would be inconvenient for a man in Virginia to have his pockets full of State bank-notes which he could not pass current in Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York. Yes, truly, but not half so inconvenient as to have nothing in his pocket that is passable in Virginia; not half so inconvenient as to have to pay 12 or 20 per cent. for a loan to be used here when State banks could let him have it if permitted at 6 per cent.; not half so if permitted at 6 per cent.; not half so inconvenient as to have nothing to pay taxes with and nothing to buy food or raiment with at home. The necessities of the people are sacred; the government that will not respect them must be made to respect them by their sovereign command; and the great necessity of the hour is an increase of the circulating medium for the daily transactions of our lives.

Now, connected with this fearful statement is the astounding fact that during these years of trial and failure money has been loaned at from 12 to 60 per cent. per annum, and that paid in advance. I know of many instances where persons were compelled to pay 5 per cent. a month for money. Even in this city, within the present session of Congress, I was informed of a case where a party in distress was asked $20 for the use of $80 one month.

My remedy for this dreadful outrage upon necessity, to wit, enormous interest, is a uniform rate of interest throughout the United States and that not to exceed 6 per cent. per annum. It is not my purpose now to elaborate this idea. I purpose, at some future period, (D. V.,) to treat this subject at length. I content myself now by saying that one State alone cannot regulate this matter. It must be national and uniform. If one State fixes the rate at 6 per cent., another may say 10 per cent., and the money is drained from the lower to the higher rate.

The following table shows the legal and allowable rates of interest in the United States:

Legal and allowable rates of interest in the United States.

Rate of interest of the Bank of England from 1694, &c.—Continued.

Thus it will be seen that the Bank of England, perhaps the greatest institution of the kind in the world, during a period of two hundred years has never charged exceeding 10 per cent. discount, while it has frequently been as low as 2 per cent. Very few have calculated how tremendously interest eats. A high rate of interest for long periods will ruin inevitably the borrower. Take an instance of the difference in a low rate and a high one. Says Mr. Spofford, the accomplished librarian of Congress:

One dollar loaned for one hundred years, at 6 per cent. interest added annually, will amount to $340. At 8 per cent. it amounts to $2,203. At 3 per cent. it would be $19.25, and at 12 per cent. it would be $84,075.

A curious calculation was made of a penny placed at compound interest at the birth of our Lord. The result was a solid ball of gold several times the size of our earth.

If the national-bank system is to be retained, let us have a uniform rate of interest for all the States not to exceed 6 per cent., which will cause capital to seek investment in manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, blessing alike its holder and the laborer put to work by its munificence.

COMMERCE AND IMPROVEMENT OF INLAND RIVERS.

Mr. REA. Mr. Speaker, the commercial and transportation problem is one of the most important questions now before the people of this country. In speaking in behalf of an improved commerce and cheaper transportation I do not speak in behalf of any party or section but for the whole people and the whole country. The chief want of the people of this country is a market for their surplus products, both the manufactured article and the raw material.

This is a large country, extending from ocean to ocean and from the Gulf to the lakes and Saint Lawrence, embracing an area of 3,603,884 square miles, rich in agricultural and mineral wealth, with an enlightened and energetic population of over forty millions of people whose achievements in agriculture, manufactures, the arts and sciences, command the admiration and attention of the world. The very heart of this country is traversed from north to south by the great Mississippi River, the Father of Waters, into which flows the Missouri, Arkansas, Red, Cumberland, Tennessee, Illinois, Ohio, and other rivers draining the great valley lying between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains. It is estimated that the inland navigation in this country by rivers and lakes is about fifty thousand miles.

The manufactured products of this country are now in excess of its consumption and such excess must seek a market elsewhere. The agricultural products are also largely in excess of the wants of the people for consumption and a market must be sought across the waters. We cannot live as a nation isolated and alone. We do not wish to so live. It is the wisdom of civilization to foster and facilitate commercial relations. Commerce is a great factor in civilization.

Wherever commerce is, there civilization is to be found. As a rule it may well be said that the nation that sells and exports more than it buys and imports is in a healthy condition of trade. As long as the balance of trade is in favor of a nation the flow of money by means of trade is to that country and not from it. We cannot sell and compete in the markets of the world except we have cheap transportation.

When we examine our foreign trade in the past it is not as gratifying as we wish it to be in the future. I here submit a statement taken from official sources showing the imports and exports to and from this country for the years therein named:

Statement showing the specie value of imports and exports of the United States, exclusive of coin and bullion, for the fiscal years 1830, 1840, and 1850, and from 1860 to 1877, both inclusive.

By an inspection of the above table it will be seen that our exports were in 1830 $71,670,735 and that they gradually grew up to $333,000,000 in 1860, from which time they fell during the war to $166,029,303 in 1865. On the restoration of peace our exports began to increase, amounting in the last fiscal year to $701,948,313.

In fifteen of the years given in the above table the balance of trade was against this country, ranging from $3,962,210, the lowest amount, to $182,417,491, the highest amount, while in six years the balance of trade was in our favor ranging from $1,313,824 in 1862 to $209,857,907 in 1877.

The last four years our foreign trade has been more hopeful, being in our favor during that time except one year. But while it is true that our foreign trade is more hopeful it is also true that the condition of our commercial marine is not such as to fill the American heart with pride, but on the contrary is such as to cause Americans to bow their heads in shame.

Our tonnage has been well-nigh driven from the high seas. Our exports are carried in foreign bottoms.

On this subject Mr. Cowden, of New York, in a speech before the national export trade convention held in this city in February last, said:

> Of the tonnage engaged in our foreign trade in 1850 60 per cent. was carried in American bottoms and but 40 per cent. in foreign bottoms, mainly British. Our foreign trade largely increased from 1850 to 1860. The tonnage employed in it which entered into and cleared from our ports in 1850 aggregated 8,710,000 tons. In 1860 it had risen to 17,100,000 tons. But, whereas, in 1850, only 60 per cent. of it was carried in American bottoms, our vessels carried 71 per cent. of it in 1860. This was a handsome gain, both in our trade and in our tonnage, during these ten years. It was in the dark and perilous winter of 1860 and 1861 that our ocean shipping began to decline.
> As already seen, our own ships carried 71 per cent. of our freight trade in 1860. But in 1870, ten years later, though the aggregate tonnage engaged in foreign commerce that entered and cleared at our ports was larger in 1870 than in 1860, only 38 per cent. of it was transported in American bottoms. Our tonnage had fallen off 33 per cent. in these ten years. Official reports show that a very large share of this decrease went to Great Britain, and but little of it to France or any other nation. The British tonnage entering and leaving her ports for foreign countries, in 1860, was 14,000,000 tons, and rose to 25,000,000 in 1870. As our flag went down, Britain's rose to take its place. And this somber picture has grown darker with the march of time. In our centennial year, when the nations of the earth sent representatives to congratulate us on our prosperity and power, observant eyes discovered the humiliating fact that scarcely more than one-fourth of our trade with those nations was carried on by ships that bore the American flag.

I do not propose upon this occasion to discuss the question as to how our commercial marine can be revived. I have not sufficient time to do so and keep in the line of the remarks I have intended.

Mr. Speaker, I now call the attention of the House to the question of our internal commerce and transportation. All must admit that the future prosperity of this country greatly depends upon the success we may have in availing ourselves of the markets of the world for our surplus products. As to how far we will in the future succeed in availing ourselves of these markets and thereby increasing our exports depends chiefly upon our ability to furnish cheap products at our sea-ports for foreign shipment. If we would successfully compete in the markets of the world, we must be able to furnish cheap products and give good bargains at the points for foreign shipment. This can only be done by cheap inland transportation to the seaboard.

Owing to the large area of this country and the fact that many of our products, and especially agricultural products, are produced far inland and must of necessity be transported hundreds and thousands of miles in order to reach the seaboard for foreign shipment, the cost of this inland transportation becomes the chief factor in determining the question of our ability to compete in the markets of the world with the world's products. The great and all-absorbing question to the people of this country who are inland and far from the great oceans washing our shores, is cheap transportation to the points of foreign shipment. They cannot compete in the markets of the world without such cheap transportation, and he who looks only to an increase of our tonnage upon the seas, and our commerce with the world by subsidies to ships and by modifications of our maritime laws overlooks the chief factor—the cost of inland transportation—in solving the problem.

Mr. Edward Young, chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in his report on internal commerce and transportation for 1876, uses the following language:

> The increased export trade in wheat and corn from the United States during the last two years is doubtless in part to be attributed to the low rates of interior transportation, which has enabled the western producers to compete successfully with the production of other nations in the English markets.
> To sum up the matter, everything which has tended to cheapen the cost at the seaboard ports has contributed to enable our country to find a market for its surplus production of wheat and corn abroad in competition with all other producing countries.

This internal transportation is carried by rail or by water on our rivers, canals, and lakes. That all these means of internal transportation are highly beneficial to our commerce and welfare no one can truthfully deny, and they should receive the friendly influence and aid of the Government in every way compatible with law and the public good.

I shall not stop to discuss the question of the power of Congress to aid in internal improvements. It is sufficient to say that whatever opinions may have heretofore been entertained by American statesmen and legislators on that subject, the power is now fully conceded.

The railroads have diverted and will in the future divert from our inland waters a very large part of internal transportation. Travel and the transportation of the lighter class of products will doubtless chiefly be by rail, but in order to transport our heavy and bulky agricultural and other products to the seaboard at such rates as to enable the owner thereof to compete lively in the markets of the world, we must avail ourselves of our navigable rivers. These navigable water-lines are our great natural channels of commerce, the great regulators of the rates of transportation. Heavy and bulky freights can be transported cheaper on these water-lines than they can by rail. The Government should improve these rivers and lakes, not stingily, but liberally.

When we consider that the total value of our internal commerce is estimated to be at least twenty-five times greater than our foreign commerce, then the magnitude of the problem of cheap internal transportation becomes gravely apparent. It not only enables our people living in the interior to lay down their products at seaboard points of foreign shipment at reasonable prices, but it enables them to transport from the seaboard to the interior at cheap rates such foreign products as may be needed, and enables our citizens in the different and distant parts of our country to exchange with each other their products upon reasonable terms.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak mainly of the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, embracing navigable waters of about twenty thousand miles in length draining an area of more than twelve hundred thousand square miles with a population of twenty millions of people.

This great river with its tributaries drains the great Mississippi Valley, the richest and most productive valley in natural resources upon the face of the earth. The products of this valley are mainly situated far distant from the sea-ports, and must of necessity be transported a great distance to reach the sea-ports for foreign shipment. These great rivers when properly improved must in the future furnish the cheapest transportation for these products. The magnitude of the production of that valley and the interest its people have in the question of cheap transportation swell to gigantic proportions when attention is called to some of its chief agricultural products.

The States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska in the year 1876 produced 888,036,000 bushels of corn, 159,907,000 bushels of wheat, 10,723,000 bushels of rye, 176,609,000 bushels of oats, 15,660,000 bushels of barley, and 1,488,800 bushels of buckwheat, making in all 1,252,423,800 bushels. The total valuation of corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, tobacco, and hay produced in the above-named ten States in the year 1876 was $614,773,928; greater in value than the total valuation of either the imports or domestic exports of the United States for that year, and about one-half in value of all like products in the United States for that year.

The average freight rates from Saint Louis to New Orleans by river, in 1875, were a little over 23 cents per 100 pounds or 13.8 cents per bushel of grain of 60 pounds, while the average rates for the same time by rail were 38 cents per 100 pounds or 22.8 cents per bushel of 60 pounds, making 15 cents per 100 pounds and 9 cents per bushel cheaper rates by river than by rail on the average rates. But the lowest rates by river, when the river was in good boating order, were 11 cents per 100 pounds or 6.6 cents per bushel, and by rail at that time 35 cents per 100 pounds or 19 cents per bushel, making a difference in favor of the river, when in good boating condition, of 24 cents per 100 pounds or 12.4 cents per bushel.

When the river was low and bars and other obstructions obstructed navigation the rates by rail rose to 45 cents per 100 pounds, or 27 cents per bushel, being 34 cents per 100 pounds and 20.4 cents per bushel greater than by river when in good boating order. The freight rates by ocean from New Orleans to New York for 1875 were 12½ cents per bushel for corn and wheat, and to Great Britain from New Orleans 20 cents per bushel. The cost of transportation of a bushel of wheat from Saint Louis to New York, when transported to New Orleans by river when in good boating condition, was 19 cents, and to Great Britain 26½ cents, but when the river was low and navigation thereon obstructed the cost by rail and ocean to New York was 39½ cents, and to Great Britain 47 cents, making 20½ cents per bushel to New York and Great Britain cheaper by river and ocean when the river was in good boating condition than by rail and ocean when the river was low.

The highest rate by river from Saint Louis to New Orleans in 1875 was eighteen cents per bushel when the water was low, while the lowest rate when the river was in good boating condition, as I have stated, was six; 6 cents per bushel, making a difference of 11½ cents per bushel in favor of low freights when the river was in a good boating stage. There was shipped from Saint Louis to New Orleans in 1875 2,251,892 bushels of grain and exported from New Orleans to foreign ports 2,459,986 bushels. To ship that grain from Saint Louis to New Orleans by river when at low water and navigation most obstructed would cost $258,967.58 more than to ship it when the river is in the best boating stage at the lower rates of freight, and the difference of freight charges on that amount of grain between the lowest river rates and the lowest rail rates would be $279,486.50 in favor of the river. The difference between the highest and lowest rates of charges on the Mississippi from Saint Louis to New Orleans is not because there is not at all times a sufficient quantity of water. There is always an abundance of water, but when the river is low there are some sand-bars, snags, and other obstructions which hinder and imperil navigation.

If these obstructions were removed and the water confined in narrower limits in the shallow places there would be at all times good, safe, and cheap transportation.

The grain trade between Saint Louis and New Orleans has and will increase very greatly, and it is easily shown that the difference in the cost of transportation of grain alone would in a short time pay for improving the river so as to afford good navigation all the year; and, when we take into the estimate all other freights upon that river and its tributaries, I assert with full confidence that the amount saved in freight alone between Saint Louis and New Orleans and intermediate points during the first year after the river between those points was permanently improved and its channel deepened where needed, so as to make easy and safe transportation for steamboats and barges all the season, would more than pay the cost of improvement.

I have not the rates of freight charges by rail from Saint Louis to the chief grain ports on the Atlantic seaboard, and hence am unable to give the figures, but they are known to be much larger than the river freights to New Orleans. The average freight charges by rail from Saint Paul to Chicago in 1875 were about 14.4 cents per bushel for grain; the river rates to Saint Louis about 15 cents per bushel, from Chicago to New York by water 11 cents, by lake and rail 14 cents, and by all rail 24 cents per bushel; so that the cheapest rates from Saint Paul to New York via Chicago were 25.4 cents per bushel. Add to this, say 17 cents per bushel from New York to Liverpool for ocean freight and we have 42.4 cents per bushel from Saint Paul to Liverpool by taking water line from Chicago to New York, which is the cheapest; but if we take all-rail transportation from Chicago to New York we have per bushel from Saint Paul to Chicago 14.4 cents and from Chicago to New York 24 cents, making total cost from Saint Paul to New York via Chicago 38.4 cents, to which add 17 cents for ocean freight from New York to Liverpool and we have the total cost from Saint Paul to Liverpool, via Chicago and New York, 55.4 cents per bushel.

It has never been this cheap until within the last year or two. Take the river rates from Saint Paul to Saint Louis, 15 cents per bushel, and add to that 6.6 cents from Saint Louis to New Orleans, and we have 21.6 cents per bushel from Saint Paul to Saint Louis, to which add 20 cents for ocean freight from New Orleans to Liverpool, and we have total cost from Saint Paul to Liverpool, via New Orleans, 41.6 cents per bushel. This makes a difference in favor of the New Orleans route of about 1 cent per bushel from Saint Paul to Liverpool if the water-route from Chicago to New York is taken, but if all-rail route from Chicago to New York is taken then the difference in favor of the New Orleans route is 15.4 cents per bushel. This showing is with the river unimproved. With the river improved the difference would be at least 10 cents per bushel in favor of the New Orleans route over the lowest rates to New York. There were shipped eastward from the State of Minnesota alone in 1875 13,754,291 bushels of wheat and 1,877,200 barrels of flour, and south by river 204,969 bushels of wheat and 9,148 barrels of flour.

Why so large a shipment east and so small south? The answer is that during the war the shipments had of necessity to be eastward and as a result a fixed trade was made in that direction, and besides that the navigation on the Mississippi River at low water was so obstructed by sand-bars and other obstructions that it was not safe to depend upon a trade in that direction. Improve that river and give uniform good navigation and it will not be so. It is estimated by those most familiar with navigation on the Mississippi River that if that river were so improved as to give five feet depth from Saint Paul to Saint Louis, and eight feet from Saint Louis to Cairo, and ten feet from Cairo to New Orleans, the transportion of grain from Saint Paul to New Orleans would not exceed 10 cents per bushel; but should it reach from 10 to 15 cents per bushel then the New Orleans route to Liverpool would be from 8 to 10 cents per bushel cheaper than via New York.

I will here state that I have taken the rates of freight which I have given from the annual report of the Bureau of Statistics on internal commerce and navigation, where they are given by experts, whose position and occupation enabled them to know the facts.

I call attention to the magnitude of the commerce on the Mississippi River. It is shown in the above report that the enrolled tonnage of the Mississippi and its tributaries in 1876 was as follows: number of vessels, 2,865; tonnage, 400,512 tons; and it is stated upon good authority that there may be added to this, for 1877, 95 vessels, with 20,000 tonnage, which makes, for 1877, 2,960 vessels, with tonnage amounting to 420,512 tons.

In relation to the grain trade alone of Saint Louis, Mr. Slater, secretary of the Saint Louis Elevator Company, in an interview reported to have been had with him, said:

I have been in my present position for nine years, and you may gain some idea of the wonderful growth of the business of Saint Louis when I tell you that during the first year we handled only five hundred thousand bushels of grain, during the next year a million and a quarter bushels, and so on up till last year we handled nine millions of bushels. We draw our grain not only from the railroads but from the boats of the Missouri River Packet Company and the Naples Packet Company, both of which bring large amounts down to us.

Q. What do river men, as a rule, think of the grain-trade prospect?

Mr. S. The boats are making large preparations for carrying bulk grain, and that is the best criterion.

Q. I suppose you are prepared to meet any rush of business that may occur?

Mr. S. We can, with the greatest of ease, unload 125,000 bushels and load 250,000 bushels per day, which is the same as loading eight and unloading three steamships. On a pinch, we can double that capacity.

Q. Is it necessary to unload all the barges from up-river?

Mr. S. Yes. They are too small to be available in going South and must be emptied into barges twice their size.

Q. About what proportion of your receipts is corn?

Mr. S. You can safely say that over half of the entire amount is corn. The other half is made up of wheat, rye, and oats.

Q. How many bushels of grain can be taken South by one tow?

Mr. S. About two hundred thousand, or may be two hundred and fifty thousand.

Turn for a moment from the Mississippi River to the Ohio River. The following is copied from the Cincinnati Commercial of a recent date:

The tow-boat Josh Williams is on her way to New Orleans with a tow of thirty-two barges, containing six hundred thousand bushels (seventy-six pounds to the bushel) of coal exclusive of her own fuel, being the largest tow ever taken to New Orleans or anywhere else in the world. Her freight bill, at three cents per bushel, amounts to $18,000.

It would take eighteen hundred cars of three hundred and thirty-three bushels to the car (which is an overload for a car) to transport this amount of coal. At $10 per ton, or $100 per car, which would be a fair price for the distance by rail, the freight bill would amount to $180,000, or $162,000 more by rail than by river.

The tow will be taken from Pittsburgh to New Orleans in fourteen or fifteen days. It would require one hundred trains of eighteen cars to the train to transport this one tow of six hundred thousand bushels of coal, and even if it made the usual speed of fast-freight lines it would take one whole summer to put it through by rail.

There has been spent I believe $1,000,000 on the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi, with a contract for about four more millions when a depth of thirty feet is reached. This improvement is adding very much to the commerce on the rivers whose commerce goes down the Mississippi and has greatly increased the grain trade via New Orleans. By permission I here insert an extract taken from a letter written by Mr. Higby, owner of New Orleans elevators, dated New Orleans, March 29, 1878. He says:

Since January 1 our receipts of grain have been four times as large as 1877, same time, the cause for which has been deeper water out the mouth of our river and ships can now load entirely with grain. In 1877 there was sixteen to twenty feet, this year twenty to twenty-three feet, and getting deeper every week. All our shipments are by foreign ships to Europe and mostly by steam. Freights to Liverpool from 10 to 10½d. per bushel. New York rates have been 6¼ to 8¼d. per bushel.

No more risk in shipping grain from Saint Louis via New Orleans to Europe than from Chicago; same grade grain.

I have never known a cargo of inspected, sound grain from here by steam to arrive out of condition.

There are no American steamships in our foreign grain trade here. We have loaded since January several steamships entirely with grain, sixty to seventy-five thousand bushels.

Our port charges are reduced very low. Grain three-fourths of a cent a bushel from barge to ship.

As bearing upon the increased grain trade of New Orleans, I quote from the New Orleans Democrat of February 24, as follows:

At the present time there are in the port of New Orleans 21 steamships, 40 ships, 42 barks, 4 brigs, and 15 schooners, making an aggregate of 122 vessels against 98 last year at this date.

The British steamer Texas has cleared for Liverpool with 26,199 bushels of corn in bulk, and the steamer Ithuriel for the same port with 35,000 bushels of wheat in bulk.

Thus it will be seen our export trade in grain goes bravely on. The exports of corn from New Orleans thus far foot up 3,757,887 bushels, while last year at this date they amounted to 1,082,365 bushels.

The receipts of coffee at this port from Rio de Janeiro to date have been 150,635 bags, while last year for same period they were 104,438 bags—a most gratifying increase.

The improvement by the jetties is bound to greatly increase the grain and other trade from New Orleans. All that is wanting to make it the greatest grain-shipping sea-port in the world is the proper improvement of the navigable rivers leading to the jetties. No expenditures of money by the Government would be so good an investment, in my judgment.

The Anglo-American Times, published in London, says:

The consumption of corn in Europe is now large, but will be presently enormous when the means of carriage are supplied from the center of the great valley of the Mississippi to London, Bristol, Liverpool, and to the ports of the continent. The transport may be by water. Maize cannot afford costly transport; but it will pay all concerned when the advantages offered by the river system of the valley are turned to the best account. * * * The opening of the mouth of the Mississippi through the jetties formed by Eads solved the problem, and now are to be seen the disjointed efforts of those who seek first to take advantage of the change.

It must be borne in mind that I have only mentioned a few of the many products of the Mississippi Valley seeking an outlet to the sea by river.

In the early days of this Republic the statesmen of that time saw the great necessity in having possession of the mouth of this Mississippi River, and Mr. Jefferson in order to secure that end purchased from Spain its possession at the month of said river at great cost at the time to the Government, so that this Government might have the uncontrolled and undivided ownership of this great natural highway and its tributaries. It was declared by the ordinance of 1787 that—

The Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries shall forever remain free and unobstructed highways, free to the commerce of the whole people of the United States.

These great rivers belong to the whole people and are in the keeping of Congress. No State or municipality can interfere with them. No one can deprive the people of their free use. There can be no monopoly thereon. They are free to every one who chooses to float a boat on their waters. No State can levy toll or tax for their use. The same rains that moisten the earth for the production of crops aid in furnishing these rivers with water to transport these same crops to the ocean.

Mr. Speaker, the early pioneers in the great Mississippi Valley endured many hardships and denied themselves many of the luxuries of life in order to open up that vast area of fertile country to cultivation. They have been the consumers of manufactured goods and have been taxed by unjust tariff laws millions of dollars at a time when the freight charges on their agricultural products to the seaboard were so great that there was no margin left for profits.

Their great navigable rivers have been neglected while large sums of money have been expended from the national Treasury for the improvement of harbors at the sea-ports and on our large lakes. Yea, more than that, the Government has liberally granted aid to railroad corporations whose roads when constructed have laid heavily the hand of contribution on the agriculturists of that valley.

It is estimated that the Government has given to States and corporations for railroad purposes from 1850 to 1876 over two hundred millions of acres of land, besides aiding the Union Pacific Railroad with bonds amounting, principal and interest, to about $90,000,000. States, counties, and municipalities have also aided railroads in bonds and money amounting to millions of dollars.

Where is the statesmanship in spending millions and millions of money and property in aiding the construction of railroads when the tariff and charges can be levied at will by the owners upon the commerce of the country, instead of liberally improving our great navigable rivers, whose waters are as free as the air we breathe to the water crafts of every citizen. On the river every boat is a competitor with every other one, but not so with the cars on a road.

The hardy sons of toil, though laboring under many disadvantages, have improved that great valley and made it the great agricultural producing section of this country. The people of that valley have petitioned Congress from time to time to improve these great rivers. They will continue to pray and petition; yes, they do and will continue to demand as a matter of justice and common right that the Government improve the great rivers that are in the exclusive keeping of the Congress. I implore Congress not to turn a deaf ear to these appeals. Remember the time is not far distant when the people of that valley can enforce obedience to their demands on this floor. They ask nothing unreasonable. They have no prejudice against any of the sea-ports on the Atlantic. They wish their brethren everywhere prosperity, but they believe they are entitled to enjoy whatever natural facilities the God of nature has placed within their reach. They only ask that the Government give to the great navigable rivers such aid in the way of their improvement as is commensurate with the wants of trade and commerce, and then leave trade to go where the laws of trade shall direct. Give the people of that valley ten cents cheaper freights per bushel on their grain to the seaboard, and correspondingly cheaper rates upon all other products, and my word for it an impetus will be given to production that will in a short time greatly increase the wealth of this nation and place upon a sure foundation the future export trade of this country.

The rich and productive soil and large navigable rivers of the Mississippi Valley are the great gifts of nature and cannot be taken away from the people. In that valley the food for the people of this and other countries in the future is largely to be produced.

God has drawn the map before us, and while that soil adheres to the earth, while those great rivers continue to flow to the ocean, while our mountains their descending sides maintain, it can never be changed. The poor and hungry want our bread and meat. Give us cheap transportation, and you will give cheap food to the hungry and will thereby confer a great blessing upon the people of the world who want the products of that valley.

These great rivers constitute a strong bond of union between the different sections of the country. For many years the people of the Lower Mississippi have had comparatively no business and little social intercourse with the people on the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries, and therefore the sections have grown quite out of sympathy. Let us begin to trade and we will soon learn what the other is worth; we shall establish friendships; we shall develop a mutuality of interest; and we shall soon be walking hand in hand with a strength that shall be irresistible. Let these relations be established and the politicians will recognize their existence and seek to profit thereby. Thus, business and politics, taking common ground, will make short work of sectional questions and unite the people in a bond of mutual friendship and mutual interest which can never be sundered.

As the waters in these great rivers noiselessly and quietly flow towards the gulf they harmoniously unite and commingle together in one great river, which majestically flows along until it is lost in the ocean. There the waters of all these rivers reach one common destination. So must the people of that valley, in the very nature of things, in harmony and peace be united and march on to one common destiny. There is a unity of interest between them that can never be destroyed. Party zeal and other disturbing causes may have in the past well-nigh caused them to forget their common interest, but with the return of peace and trade and a restoration of reason, that unity of interest will be remembered and invoked and will draw that people together and cause them to labor for their common interest, and then, if not before, their wants and demands will be respected.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield my time to my colleague, [Mr. BRAGG,] as the remarks I intended to remark are not the remarks that I shall remark this evening, and therefore in a very remarkable manner I will yield my remarks to my colleague's remarks.

WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, this House has before it a bill entitled "A bill to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the war."

There underlies this proposed measure, sir, a question of more than ordinary import. The discussion of it commenced with a glowing tribute paid the College of William and Mary and her renowned alumni by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] a classic son of Harvard, responded in an effort so replete with elegant diction and scholarly attainment and rich in historic reminiscence that the senses, for the time dazzled and bewildered by its learning and beauty, were captivated; judgment forgot its office and sentiment took its place.

I confess it an ungrateful task for a plain, blunt-spoken man, devoid of magnetism or oratorical art, but possessed only of an earnest conviction of the truth of his sentiments, to obtrude himself upon the scene to jar and disrupt with his discordant voice the delicious reveries produced by the sentimental elixir, so subtly administered. But, sir, a sense of duty to my countrymen, South as well as North, will not permit me to sit quietly by and see the great evil attending the passage of this bill fastened upon us by specious sophistry.

Words, with me, sir, serve their true purpose when used to express, not conceal, ideas. It matters not if I am called a bigot or fanatic, I maintain that this bill is a crafty device to foist upon us southern war claims as skillfully planned and as certain in results as the wooden horse that carried woe and ruin within the walls of far-famed Troy.

The amount proposed to be given is not large, but the shadow it casts before it is large enough to darken the land.

The reasons given are plausible; the disciple of Æsculapius gilds with a rich sugar-coating a noxious drug that the stomach of his patient revolts at, but when it is once swallowed the purpose is as surely accomplished as though no device had been used to make the vile dose palatable. So the learned doctor from Harvard has heaped the stores of his learning, thickly interspersed with sentiment, over and around this measure to hide its real meaning and significance, but the patient, beguiled by the garnishment into the adoption of the prescription, cannot escape its fatal consequences.

Before entering upon the consideration of these consequences, let us briefly review the alleged facts out of which this claim arises. They are recited by the learned advocates of the measures as follows:

During the first year of the war, until May, 1862, the college was held first as barracks and then as hospital for confederate forces. From that time until the close of the war, except for a few hours on the 9th day of September, 1862, it was occupied by Union troops, and was used by them for the storing of military supplies and other purposes of convenience to our armies. In a skirmish on the 9th day of September, 1862, the main building was burned by the Federal forces, who occupied them, and at a later period of the war, during which the same forces held possession of them, all the remaining houses upon the college premises were, with the inclosures, burned wholly or in part pulled to pieces.

From this statement of facts, independent of positive evidence, which I believe exists, proving the same thing, I maintain it is apparent that the confederates, and not the Union troops, fired the building, and that they, and not we, are the vandals, if the burning was an act of vandalism.

Mark the statement:

From May, 1862, except for a few hours on the 9th day of September, 1862, it was occupied by Union troops for storing military supplies and other purposes of convenience. In a skirmish on the 9th day of September, 1862, it was fired, &c.

The question is pertinent, who occupied the college buildings for the few hours on the 9th of September, 1862, when the buildings were vacated by the Union troops? Rebel cavalry in flagrant war. The report shows there was no fire before they took possession, but one broke out soon after they left. To one familiar with the operations of such raiding parties this tells the story as well as a cloud of witnesses. But the committee find that after the building was retaken straggling soldiers, inflamed by liquor and smarting under defeat, fired it. That is to say, the committee find, as one of the grounds to sustain this bill, that rebel raiders were too generous to destroy Yankee stores and so the Yanks from sheer spite burned their own. I submit to my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] who won distinction in the cavalry service, whether such magnanimity on the part of cavalry was ever known until discovered in a congressional committee-room.

But, sir, I only allude to this cavalry phenomenon as an incident of what is sought to be made history to give coloring to the prayer for relief. In my opposition to this measure I stand on no nice distinction as to whether one side or the other fired the building, but I take the broad ground that its destruction was one of the ravages of war, for which there is not the least liability for reimbursement. Such is the universal law of nations. It was settled by an American Congress in 1797, when Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe and many of the long list of the illustrious dead whose spirits have been invoked and memories revived and passed in panoramic view before this House in the early stages of this discussion were the directing spirits of this Government—

That the loss of houses, and other sufferings by the general ravages of war, have never been compensated by this or any other government.—American State Papers; Claims, page 199.

Come, then, shades of the mighty dead, and open the eyes of these thy followers, and so direct their judgments that they professing the most unbounded admiration and reverence for your wisdom shall not for paltry alms violate your precepts.

But, sir, viewed in another light, the College of William and Mary forfeited any right which she may have had as an educational institution sacred from the touch of war by becoming herself an engine of war, an active participant in rebellion. She not only sent her pupils to the red field of battle with words of encouragement and blessing, but she banished the muses from her groves, threw wide open her gates, and made her venerable halls barracks for soldiery to destroy the Government from which now in all humility she asks recompense. I do not state this too strongly; the report shows that before the footsteps of a northern soldier darkened her halls, they had been converted into barracks and a hospital, in aid of the rebellion. The learned faculty cannot plead ignorance of consequences in case of failure; but they never counted failure among the possibilities. I shall not go into details of the horrors of that war, and of its cost in blood and treasure. I deprecate the reopening of that subject on this floor as much as any man; but I say to the Representatives of the South, in all kindness, the discussion of it will last, and properly so, while you force it into notice by the presentation of claims resulting from it.

It is with you to withdraw the subject from discussion or to keep it constantly before us by introducing such claims as the present. It was a bitter, murderous conflict, and the battle was lost through no flinching of yours. The world never witnessed greater devotion to a bad cause, and your personal bravery won from your enemy respect and admiration. When the smoke of the conflict cleared away, like brave men, as you are, you bade farewell to the cause you could not maintain, and in good faith accepted the situation and came back to the house of your fathers to support and defend it against all foes, foreign and domestic.

Wonderful in its proportions as the war was, it has been followed by results still more wonderful, and he who sees the yielding of the barriers of sectional hate before an enlightened patriotism, and upon their ruins a reunion of national brotherhood being rapidly cemented, may exclaim of a truth—

> Peace hath her victories
> No less renowned than war!

I appeal to my southern friends on this side of the House, will you deliberately rake the ashes off the slumbering embers, and fan them into a blaze again? I believe in my heart you will not. But I am bound to tell you, and I do it in kindness, for though in war I was your open enemy, in peace I am your earnest friend, and as such I say to you "The people of the North will never submit to be taxed to reimburse your people, or your States out of the National Treasury for any losses that they sustained directly or indirectly from the rebellion." It was your rebellion, you have harvested its fruits, and must patiently bear its results, bitter though they be.

There may be men in the North—their voice has been heard on this floor speaking words of encouragement to you in presenting claims like this one for reimbursement; but it is no true expression of northern sentiment; they are the words of a siren that lures to death. You heard them and trusted them in 1860 and 1861; will you trust them again now?

Can you blame the North for their determined opposition to such reimbursement? Had you been victors instead of vanquished, would you have imposed taxes upon your people, groaning under the weight of a debt contracted in overpowering us, additional burdens to compensate us for our losses? Southern statesmanship is too wise and far-seeing for that. The democratic party of the North desires to advance your present interest and future welfare; but this does not mean relieving you from any of your losses, or assuming any of your obligations. She recognizes you in your present status as worthy of trust and confidence in all that relates to the present and future, and the States you represent as free, equal, sovereign States; and upon all questions disconnected with the war, she stands your true friend, believing and teaching that the prosperity of the common country is best advanced by the culture and promotion of the rights and interests of each and all of its constituent parts. Her policy is broad and catholic, and when it shall again prevail the burdens of Government will be lightened, class legislation will cease, the rights of the poor will be respected as well as the wishes of the richer, and an era of prosperity will dawn upon the nation.

The republican party was born of sectionalism; it grew to its great strength, fattening upon the fruits of the folly and madness of southern men, and now, when the people have sickened with its corruptions and violations of the written law, will you for the temporary gratification resulting from an insignificant appropriation, or a thousand of them, awaken a distrust in the northern mind of your purposes and make prophetic the declarations of gentlemen upon the other side that you are here in the interest of southern claims and that the fruits of a democratic majority in the Congress will be the consummation of your purpose? God forbid! You have felt the iron heel of central power upon your necks; you have seen your States robbed in the name of law by the myrmidons of a republican oligarchy; you have enjoyed the elective franchise under the dictation of a corporal and his squad, and have been deprived of the fruits of the ballot-box by unblushing fraud and crime that in barbarian China would have brought a judgment of "hari-kari" upon its perpetrators; but in enlightened, free America, instead of punishment it hath brought official reward to all connected with it, because they did the bidding of the corrupt party whose lease of power was extended by it.

In the light of the past, my southern friends, are you now willing to furnish again a battle-cry to your old enemy that shall place it again in power and enable it in its caprice to re-enact the scenes you have passed since the close of the war and your return to citizenship.

Southern claims is the last card left to the republican party to play. Upon it rests the last hope of the organization, and it is for you in a great measure to determine whether it shall prove the ruling trump.

It would be an act of injustice to my own belief and an act of greater injustice to you did I here hesitate to say that these claims, about which so much has been and will be said are not presented of your own volition nor in the hope or belief that they will or ought to be paid. Your sense of right, I feel safe in saying, is averse to the payment of the cloud of claims that find admittance here because of the great right of every citizen to present for consideration his petition or claim, whether it be just or unjust, so only that it be done in language that is respectful.

But men are not always permitted to act upon individual conviction. A member of this House is a representative; he acts for others more than himself; he is the agent through whom each individual constituent has a right to be heard. And when an impoverished constituency or constituent demands consideration he would be more than mortal if he could refuse to introduce his claim for relief to the consideration of this House.

We men of the North know and feel the difficulties under which you labor, and the delicate position in which you are placed, with Scylla upon the one side and Charybdis on the other. And for this reason I appeal to the Representatives of the northern democracy to stand by the pledged faith of their party and by an unbroken vote on this question save the country, save their southern friends, save their party from the baleful effects that will certainly follow this precedent.

Let it be known that under no guise, under no pretext will such claims be paid, and the work is done, and the pressure of a constituency in favor of such bills will cease, and the galleries of this House will be cleared of the hungry, anxious, eager crowd of claimants, that sit day after day watching and waiting for the hour to come when their claims shall be reached and passed.

We upon this side of the House are in no wise responsible for this condition of affairs. The republican party opened the door, in an effort to toll the southern voters into their camp.

The war had no sooner closed than "presto," hosts of loyal people were discovered, where nothing but black-handed treason had been seen before.

What produced the change? A willingness to vote the republican ticket, combined with the three great cardinal virtues of that party, addition, division, and silence, was an accredited test of loyalty. And to provide a reward for these loyal converts to radicalism a court was organized to adjust their claims, and a republican Congress commenced paying and continued to pay southern claims while it remained in power, until the sums paid its retainers footed up many millions. And when its power passed away their loyal wards were bequeathed to us as a legacy, when the scenes shifted again. Carpet-bagging had lost its prestige, and southern claimants lapsed into their original sinful state, and the cry against rebel claims to be paid by their northern democratic confederates became the burden of the song of every loyal republican campaigner in the North. And yet the fact stares them in the face that this bill was originally introduced by a republican and reported favorably by a republican committee, and is now supported most strenuously by a republican.

Such cant and hypocrisy is best described by designating it as the climax of modern republicanism.

I submit to you, men of the South, whether the men who availed themselves and are still seeking to avail themselves of the laws of a republican Congress providing for the payment to loyal southern men (so called) were in fact loyal to this Government during the war. I believe that you who know them best will bear me out in the assertion that their pretended loyalty was and is a sham and a fraud, and that the amount of losses claimed to have been sustained by them in most instances is fully equal if not a greater fraud than the pretense of loyalty that accompanies them.

There were no loyal men who remained in the South during the war. It was not in the nature of things. Their sympathies may have been with us in the outset, but it is not in flesh and blood to sympathize with men who are killing our brothers, kinsfolk, and friends, sacking our villages and towns, and laying waste our country, no matter in what cause it is done. He who professes he did so adds the sin of perjury to that of disloyalty, or proves himself to be devoid of the ordinary instinct of human nature and unworthy of the consideration or respect of anybody.

Whenever there was a show of loyalty it came from a class of men who sang "Rally round the flag" and the rollicking notes of "Dixie" with equal unction, false to either side in turn and thoroughly despised by both. I never believed in them when they were the protégés of the republican party, and think still less of them now.

But to recur more directly to the measure under consideration, I am bound in all fairness to admit that the friends of it disclaim it as a southern war claim but support it as a great educational measure. Their disclaimer does not change the character of the bill.

> You may break, you may shatter the vase, if you will,
> But the scent of the roses will cling round it still.

And so will this bill present all the distinctive features of a southern war claim, call it what other name you may. Such special pleading does great credit to the ingenuity of the pleader, but it will not and ought not deceive the people.

Is it really expected that the northern people will believe the lamp of science is to go out and the world be left in Cimmerian darkness if the college of William and Mary is not built up at the expense of the nation? There are eight other colleges in Virginia alone, namely: Washington and Lee University, Richmond College, Hampden and Sidney College, Randolph Macon College, Roanoke College, University of Virginia, and Emory and Henry College. Are none of these of sufficiently high tone to meet the requirements of Virginia's rising statesmen that we must donate $65,000 to repair the loss sustained by a rebel corporation during the war?

Had the College of William and Mary clung as closely to the Government in the hour of her pride and glory as she does now in pursuit of alms, her sons would not have been cheered on to battle against the Union and her halls converted from the home of science and letters to barracks for rebel soldiery. If we give alms to her, caught in flagrant war, how can we refuse all other institutions of learning in the South, and there are many of them, which were destroyed or injured by troops in the progress of war?

If a precedent be established for institutions of learning, are we so blind that we cannot see that places of religious worship have equal, if not greater, claim, and are already pressing them supported by better reasons than are urged for this bill? Orphan asylums, lodges of benevolent societies, court-houses, State-houses, public libraries, and what then shall prevent the payment of individual losses? It is true there are several steps, but they are in order, and one is a logical deduction from the other, and is as certain to follow as morning follows night and noon follows morning.

If rebel corporations have a right to repayment can there be any appreciable difference in principle between paying the corporation and the corporators in severalty?

Facilis Averni descensus. There can be no stop when you once commence; you may disclaim the precedent, but, like "Poor Rip of the Catskills," you will yield at each new temptation, soothing conscience each time by declaring "We won't count this one!"

The battle must be fought at the gate sooner than at the porch, at the threshold rather than at the altar. The hungry wolf cannot be driven from the door by meat thrown to him when he comes. No more will greedy claimants cease their importunate solicitation if their petition be ever heeded, be it never so slightly.

Mr. Speaker, I love and revere ancient institutions of learning as much as any man, but I state my candid convictions that sooner than pass this bill it will be far better for the country—better for Virginia herself—to keep the old college in ruins, a monument of Virginia's folly and madness, putting the simple inscription upon her broken arches—

> Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat:
> Circumspice!

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: Resolutions of Equity Council, No. 5, Sovereigns of Industry, representing one hundred and seventy-five families in the District of Columbia, petitioning Congress to enact a law that will insure full weight to purchasers of coal and to compel coal-dealers to send the certificate of a properly appointed Government weigher with every load of coal delivered—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BICKNELL: The petition of Spencer B. Pugh and others, for a post-route from Millport to Delany's Creek, Washington County, Indiana—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BURDICK: The petition of M. W. Harmon, Z. Stout, and 60 other citizens of Iowa, that the duty on quinine may be removed—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama: The petition of Mrs. R. B. McCaa, guardian, &c., for compensation for one hundred bales of cotton seized by Treasury agents in August, 1875, and sold—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. HOOKER: The petition of Joseph B. Inabnet, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MANNING: The petition of William H. Brown, sr., of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. PUGH: The petition of Washington Council, No. 10, Order of United American Mechanics, Mount Holly, New Jersey, that Congress refrain from meddling with the present tariff system—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROBERTS: The petition of John H. Tolson, of Maryland, for indemnity for the sinking of the schooner Ann and her cargo in the Patapsco River, Maryland, by collision with the United States steam-tug Robert Leslie—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. TIPTON: A letter from D. L. Brancher, relating to the financial condition of the country—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. WAIT: The petition of Humphrey E. Woodhouse, relative to a claim against the Republic of Mexico—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of the Detroit (Michigan) Labor League, by Charles C. Miller, president, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 20) to extend the scope and efficiency of the homestead act of May 20, 1862—to the Committee on Public Lands.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 2, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADVERTISING MAIL-LETTINGS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3987) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the announcement is agreed to by the Senate, I wish to say that I may be necessarily absent for a few days; but, aside from that, there is an eminent propriety that the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the present occupant of the chair, should be at the head of this committee. I can appreciate the delicacy of the Chair in not appointing himself; but there can be no indelicacy in my asking that I be excused and that the Senate designate the present occupant of the chair as the chairman of the committee of conference.

Mr. INGALLS. Move it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the present occupant of the chair be the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate, in lieu of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Charles Harrison, of Caldwell County, Missouri, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the memorial of certain citizens of Wyandotte County, Kansas, in favor of the repeal of the resumption act and remonstrating against any further contraction of the greenback currency. I will say that, although the memorial is not numerously signed, it represents largely the sentiment of my State on both the questions mentioned, especially on the question of the contraction of the currency. I move that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented resolutions of sundry councils of the Order of United American Mechanics, located at Pittsburgh and other points in the State of Pennsylvania, against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of David Hardie, passed assistant engineer United States Navy, praying the passage of a law giving him the benefit of his sea-service pay as provided in the acts of 1862 and 1870, and that he may be placed upon the retired list; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALLACE presented nine memorials from the Order of United American Mechanics, representing several lodges in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of J. C. Nagle and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act imposing a tax on incomes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the memorial of many merchants in the city of Boston, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3580) to provide ocean mail-steamship service between the United States and Brazil; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the mayor and other citizens of New York, praying for an increased appropriation for the improvement of Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the water-way between the Hudson and East Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the memorial of Jearum Atkins, who sets forth in substance that he has been the inventor of certain automatic rakes for harvesters, &c., which have been of very great value to agriculture, the benefit of which inventions he has entirely lost through the powerful pressure of monopolies, &c. He wishes Congress to grant him a sum of money. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Agriculture, as it has nothing to do with patents except the mere incidental fact.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of Levin P. Clark, of Maryland, praying for the extension of his patent for an improvement in hydrants; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of Humphrey E. Woodhouse, of New York, praying, for himself and on behalf of others alike interested, for the passage of a law authorizing a rehearing of his claim against the Republic of Mexico by the United States and Mexican claims commission, authorized by the convention of July 4, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to enter a motion that the memorial of the Choctaw Nation, asking for a settlement of their claims arising under the treaty of 1875, presented by me yesterday and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, be printed. Such was my motion yesterday, but I believe the Chair did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. GORDON presented a petition of citizens of Pulaski, Irwin, and Wilcox Counties, Georgia, praying the establishment of a weekly mail route from Hawkinsville, Pulaski County, via Cason's House, &c., to Tifton, on the Albany and Brunswick Railroad, in the county of Berrien; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 518) for the relief of William Smitha, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1087) to provide additional regulations for homestead and pre-emption entries of public lands, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 959) for the protection of homestead settlers on the public lands, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 430) for the relief of John Clinton, postmaster at Brownsville, Tennessee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 97) granting a pension to William A. Miller, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 300) for the relief of Dudley A. Fish, of Bucyrus, Ohio, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3123) extending the privileges of section 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive, to the port of Bath, in the State of Maine, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1968) to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1271) establishing the salaries to be paid the collectors of customs of Plymouth and Nantucket, Massachusetts, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 299) for the relief of the Baptist Relief Association of Puget Sound, to report it adversely. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts in front of me [Mr. HOAR] to this bill as he introduced it, I think, upon request. The Senator may remember that it relates to special privileges to be granted to a vessel. The committee direct me to report adversely, thinking that it would not be prudent to pass such a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York desire the bill to be placed on the Calendar or to be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. CONKLING. Unless the Senator from Massachusetts wishes it to go on the Calendar, I move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. HOAR. The petitioners for this bill are an association of the Baptist Church in Washington Territory. Their work is accomplished by sending preachers or teachers from place to place to the thinly settled places on Puget Sound, both within and without the jurisdiction of the United States. They petitioned for some special privileges, for a vessel which they use to convey their teachers and preachers among the inlets and waters of Puget Sound. I suppose the Senate will defer to the judgment of the Committee on Commerce that it is not possible to frame a law for this relief which shall not violate the general policy of the Government. Therefore, I am not disposed to make a contest with that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CONKLING. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1025) for the payment of compensation to Edward S. Offley, late consul to Smyrna, Turkey, for judicial services rendered, to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I will say that it has been the custom of the Senate to send such bills to that committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on Commerce instruct me to report back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 3268) to authorize the North Louisiana Railroad Company to construct a bridge over the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, Louisiana, and a bridge over the Red River at or near Shreveport, Louisiana. I will state as the reason of the adverse report, that the map informs the committee that these streams are wholly within the State of Louisiana, and, as the committee understand the law, the State has authority to allow such bridges to be built and Congress is not called upon to pass judgment in such cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) to enable the joint commission to carry into effect the act of Congress providing for the completion of the Washington Monument, to report it with an amendment, and I ask that the resolution and the amendment may be read and printed and placed upon the Calendar. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The joint resolution is as follows:

That the joint commission created by the act of Congress entitled "An act providing for the completion of the Washington Monument," approved August 2, 1876, be, and they are hereby, authorized to apply a portion of the money appropriated by said act, not exceeding $36,000, to give greater stability to the foundation, if they deem it advisable.

The committee propose to amend by adding the following:

And said commission shall report the result of such expenditure to Congress at the next session, with their opinion of the stability of the foundation after such expenditure: And provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize, until the further action of Congress, the expenditure of any part of said $200,000 otherwise than as herein provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and the joint resolution placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 325) for the relief of Thomas Poultney, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1178) to provide a fire-proof building for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the mechanical branches of the Treasury and other Departments; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Edward S. Offley, late United States consul to Smyrna, Turkey, praying compensation for certain judicial services rendered by him while acting as such consul, reported adversely thereon; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

Mr. THURMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law, with the amendments of the House of Representatives, to report an amendment, to strike out all of House amendment No. 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following words:

But, as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and in respect of all pains, penalties, and forfeitures which shall have been incurred under any of said acts prior to the day when this act takes effect, or which may be thereafter incurrred under any of those provisions of any of said acts which, for the purposes named in this act, are kept in force, and all penal actions and criminal proceedings for a violation of any of said acts, whether then pending or thereafter instituted; and in respect of all rights of debtors and creditors, (except the right of commencing original proceedings in bankruptcy,) and all rights of, and suits by, or against assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any matter or case which shall have arisen prior to the day when this act takes effect, (which shall be on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879,) or in any matter or case which shall arise after this act takes effect, in respect of any matter of bankruptcy authorized by this act to be proceeded with after said last-named day.

I shall read the saving clause of the bill. The whole saving clause, as it will be in case the amendment just reported should be adopted, is as follows:

Provided, however, That such repeal shall in no manner invalidate or affect any case in bankruptcy instituted and pending in any court prior to the day when this act shall take effect; but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and in respect of all pains, penalties, and forfeitures which shall have been incurred under any of said acts prior to the day when this act takes effect, or which may be thereafter incurred under any of those provisions of any of said acts which, for the purposes named in this act, are kept in force, and all penal actions and criminal proceedings for a violation of any of said acts, whether then pending or thereafter instituted, and in respect of all rights of debtors and creditors, (except the right of commencing original proceedings in bankruptcy,) and all rights of and suits by or against assignees under any or all of said acts in any matter or case which shall have arisen prior to the day when this act takes effect, (which shall be on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879,) or in any matter or case which shall arise after this act takes effect, in respect of any matter of bankruptcy authorized by this act to be proceeded with after said last-named day, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

I wish to say a word or two in explanation of this amendment. If adopted it saves all suits which shall be pending at the time the act shall take effect. To that, of course, there can be no objection. In the next place, it saves the right to prosecute for all pains, penalties, and forfeitures which have heretofore been incurred, whether the bankrupt proceedings have closed or not; as, for instance, if perjury has been committed in a bankrupt suit which has closed, or if a forfeiture has been incurred in a bankrupt suit that is ended, this proviso will save the right to prosecute for the perjury or to enforce the forfeiture.

In the next place, it saves the right to prosecute for crimes committed or forfeitures incurred in the proceedings which are hereafter to take place after the repeal of this act in suits pending when the repeal shall take effect. That is too obviously a necessary provision to require any remark.

Then it saves the words of the House amendment No. 2.

And all penal actions and criminal proceedings for a violation of any of said acts, whether then pending or thereafter instituted.

That probably is covered by what precedes it in the amendment, but we thought it better to keep it in as it is the language of the House, as it can do no harm.

And in respect of all rights of debtors and creditors, (except the right of commencing original proceedings in bankruptcy.)

If this amendment is adopted, there can be no suits in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st of January next; but obviously the rights of debtors and creditors in respect of assets and in respect of suits then pending and which are allowed to proceed to a final consummation ought to be preserved; and we thought no better general language could preserve them than these words:

And in respect of all rights of debtors and creditors, (except the right of commencing original proceedings in bankruptcy.)

The next clause preserves the right of suits by assignees and suits against assignees, both in respect to suits that have heretofore been pending and in respect to proceedings in bankruptcy which may continue after the taking effect of this act, in cases that may be pending at the time the act takes effect. That is obviously a proper saving. Then comes the clause—

Or in any matter or case which shall arise after this act takes effect in respect of any matter of bankruptcy authorized by this act to be proceeded with after said last-named day.

That is, any right to a suit that might occur or proceedings that might be necessary in these suits, which are to proceed to their final consummation. These savings, I imagine, will be acceptable to everybody. I do not see that there can be the least objection to any of them. I think they save every right that ought to be saved and certainly save no right which ought not to be saved on a repeal of the bankrupt law.

I beg now to call the attention of the Senate, especially of my colleague, to another thing: the amendment offered by my colleague, and which was voted upon affirmatively by the Senate, was in these words:

And all acts of bankruptcy committed or petitions which may be filed before the 1st day of January, 1879.

We have left out in our amendment the words, "and all acts of bankruptcy which may be committed." We were under the impression—I certainly was—that there was a misunderstanding in taking the vote on that amendment. I was not aware, for one, that those words were in. I thought it was only saving the right to file petitions in bankruptcy up to the 1st of January, 1879.

Mr. MATTHEWS. That is all, if my colleague will allow me, that I intended or thought that the amendment would cover.

Mr. THURMAN. That is what I supposed.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I am entirely satisfied with the language as reported by the amendment of the committee this morning.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very glad of that, because if we had taken these very words it would have been said, and perhaps with irresistible force, that the bankrupt law was continued indefinitely for all cases where an act of bankruptcy was committed before the 1st of January, 1879. I am glad that the views of the committee meet the views of my colleague.

This amendment, if adopted, I think reconciles all the conflicting opinions that have been expressed on the floor, and if there is no objection to considering the bill in the morning hour and taking the vote on it, I shall move to consider it; or else I will leave it to my friend from Kentucky, the father of the bill, to move to take it up at the close of the morning hour, just as he prefers.

Mr. McCREERY. I think we had better proceed with it now.

Mr. THURMAN. I move, then, that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise merely to suggest whether it would not be better and more satisfactory to have the bill with its amendment printed and take it up to-morrow instead of to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think we shall make time by that course. There would be much time wasted now in explanation as to what these amendments are, which would not be necessary if the bill were printed as it comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, so that each Senator may see it for himself. I think we shall save time by it, and legislate in a much more satisfactory and safe manner. If it is necessary for a motion to be made to that effect, I shall move that the bill as reported from the Judiciary Committee, with its amendment, be ordered to be printed, and that it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. A single objection, unless the Senator from Indiana is too late, which the Senate is not sharp in the habit of saying, would carry this over one day. If it be the wish of the Senator from Indiana that it shall go over until to-morrow, certainly the Senate would not require a motion to acquiesce in that suggestion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is no disposition to hurry it on our part at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. In the interest of the bill, and as the friend of a substantial repeal of the bankrupt law, I make the objection in order that it may be printed and go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest that the proviso be printed in full and the amendatory part reported by the Committee on the Judiciary be printed in italics.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introdnce a bill (S. No. 1179) for the relief of the heirs of the late Captain G. H. Derby, United States Army; which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BECK (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1180) to amend section 1471 and other sections of the Revised Statutes concerning the relative rank of staff and line officers in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1181) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1182) granting a pension to Lewis S.

Blair; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DENNIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1183) to authorize the extension of the patent of Levin P. Clark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. ROLLINS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1184) proposing a new form of government for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1185) for the relief of Watson Stewart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1186) amendatory of and supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof, and supplementary thereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. KIRKWOOD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1187) to indemnify certain settlers in the Des Moines River Valley, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RAILWAY MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I offer the following order, and ask for action at this time, as I think there will be no objection to it:

Ordered, That 300 copies of the statement of Gardiner G. Hubbard on the subject of railway mail transportation be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

I will state that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have now before it for consideration a bill readjusting the compensation of railroads. This statement was made by Mr. Hubbard, who headed the postal commission which has been in existence during the past year. It is very full of statistical information, and will be very useful to the Senate when the Senate shall come to consider the committee's bill. I therefore offer the order that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the bill (S. No. 1123) to grant certain public lands in Alabama in aid of the Warrior and Tennessee Rivers Railroad be taken from the table for reference. I introduced the bill on the 23d of April. I have three memorials from the Legislature of Alabama upon the subject. I expected to make some remarks upon the bill, but the Senate is crowded with business this morning, and I merely move the reference of the bill with the accompanying papers to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILLS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. WALLACE, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. BAILEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 120) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Canadian built propeller East by the name of Kent;

An act (S. No. 149) for the relief of Charles B. Varney;

An act (S. No. 1045) to provide for the administration of the oath of office to collectors and other officers of the customs in the district of Alaska; and

An act (S. No. 767) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow the interment in the national cemetery at New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, of the remains of the late R. F. Lehman, late a commissioner of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of North Carolina.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. My impression is that the Calendar of unobjected cases is in order. We have not got quite through the Calendar yet. That is the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 805.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then if that is the motion I suppose it is not expected to come to a vote to-day?

Mr. FERRY. I am not pertinacious about it; but yesterday it was supposed that the bill proposing to repeal the bankrupt law would pass in a few minutes. It occupied most of the day. I had intended to call up this bill yesterday, but as the day was wholly occupied by the bankrupt bill I thought, as there seemed to be no further morning business to-day, I would ask the Senate to consider this measure within the morning hour. I am willing to waive it till one o'clock, and not occupy the rest of the time of the morning hour, if the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator has matters to present in the nature of morning business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; I am willing the Senator should call up his bill and address the Senate upon it. My only inquiry of the Senator was, whether it was his intention to bring the bill to a vote to-day.

Mr. FERRY. Not to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have not the slightest objection, Mr. President.

Mr. FERRY. There are one or two Senators who desire to address the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will this action prevent the Senate from going to the consideration of the Calendar on the resumption of other business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I make no objection to the request made by the Senator from Michigan, if it will not prevent the Senate from going to the consideration of the Calendar when he is through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be subject to the order of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. For the purpose of a fair understanding, I will state that there are other Senators who desire to address the Senate on the bill which I now ask the Senate to consider. I make this statement that the Senator from Minnesota may understand that perhaps the day will be principally occupied by Senators in addressing the Senate upon the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FERRY. When they are through there will be no objection to going to the Calendar. I do not desire to press the bill to a vote to-day. There is no intention of doing that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the House bill be read and the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be pursued.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill as it passed the House is in the following words:

A bill to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Be it enacted, &c., That all that portion of the act approved January 14, 1875 entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," which reads as follows, to wit, "And whenever and so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United State in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The Committee on Finance report the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act United States notes shall be receivable in payment for the 4 per cent. bonds now authorized by law to be issued; and on and after October 1, 1878, said notes shall be receivable for duties on imports; and said notes in the volume in existence on October 1, 1878, shall not be canceled nor permanently hoarded, but shall be reissued, and they may be used for funding and all other lawful purposes whatsoever, to an amount not exceeding in the whole the aggregate amount thereof then in circulation and in the Treasury; and the said notes, whether then in the Treasury or thereafter received, under any act of Congress, and from whatever source, shall be again paid out; and when again returned to the Treasury they shall not be canceled nor destroyed, but shall be reissued from time to time with like qualities; and all that part of the act of January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," authorizing the retirement of 80 per cent. of United States notes, shall cease and become inoperative on and after the said October 1, 1878.

SEC. 2. All laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act shall be, and hereby are, repealed.

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments,' and for other purposes."

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, admonished by the lateness of the session and the pending resolution fixing the day of final adjournment, I shall forego what I intended at more length to say, and content myself with as brief a statement of the reasons which dissuade concurrence in the present repeal of the resumption act as the importance of the subject will allow.

After full consideration of House bill No. 805, which proposes "to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency," your Committee on Finance have deemed it inexpedient to commend such repeal, and instead have recommended to the Senate the adoption of an amendment as a substitute for the bill, which embraces three propositions:

First. That United States notes shall at once be receivable, the same as coin, in purchase of the 4 per cent. Government bonds.

Second. That on and after October 1, 1878, United States notes shall be receivable, the same as coin, for duties on imports.

Third. That United States notes outstanding and in the Treasury on the 1st day of October, 1878, shall not be retired and canceled, but be reissued from time to time and form part of the permanent volume of the currency of the country.

The inexpediency of now repealing so much of the act of January 14, 1875, as provides for the resumption of specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879, is supported by the fact that United States notes are to-day within three-eighths of 1 per cent. of gold, and reached under the act now sought to be repealed; hastened no doubt by the beneficial effects of the act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character, which passed at this session. The resumption act was the result of mutual concession of antagonizing opinions and substantially a compromise measure. Gold on the day the act passed held a premium of 11⅛ per cent. Public opinion was then more or less divided upon the best method to bring gold and currency together in value. Fixing an early day for resumption and preparing for specie payments by a rapid contraction of the currency and the accumulation of gold by the sale of bonds was the method pressed by those who considered less the distress and disaster of such means than the assurance of an end which should base the measure of commercial values upon gold at whatever cost to the people. This was antagonized by others, who protested against forced resumption on any day fixed by statute, and contended that it could sooner and easier be reached by the laws of trade—the forces of supply and demand. Against contraction of the currency and the hoarding of gold at the expense of an increase of the interest-bearing debt of the nation, they contended. To longer discredit United States notes by refusing to receive them for duties on imports, they urged, was a serious obstacle in the way of the restoration of the currency to par with gold.

I confess, Mr. President, that as an early advocate of the receivability of United States notes for duties and against contraction and forced resumption, as the safest, speediest method of arriving at resumption, rather than by naming a day when specie payments should be enforced, I reluctantly joined in the compromise measure of 1875, which I feared would entail upon the business and toiling community incalculable woe. The universal distress and unparalleled failures which have followed these past years of trial must sadly record the severity of the process which has brought the country so near resumption and so close to financial ruin. The remonetization of silver was a tardy step in the right direction, and though taken in the face of the protests and forebodings of its opponents, the measure has partly lifted the burden and extorted the confession that its aid to a return of commercial confidence and national prosperity has been, and is, undeniable.

The provision for the coinage of from two to four millions of silver dollars monthly, to swell the circulating medium of the country, has become an efficient agent of relief in the current stringency. It is gratifying to notice how promptly the Secretary of the Treasury has provided for the execution of this remedy by having at this early day all the Government mints at work coining the silver dollar. Over two and a half millions have already been coined. That the financial condition of the country favorable to early resumption may not be underrated, it may be well to consider, by comparison, the monetary standing of the country at the passage of the resumption act and now, when a proposition is pending for its repeal.

On the 14th of January, 1875, the day the resumption act was approved, the amount of United States notes outstanding and in the Treasury was $382,000,000
Amount of gold in the Treasury was 67,236,360
Amount of silver coin and bullion was 3,668,675
Amount of national-bank notes outstanding 351,861,450

Making a total of 804,766,485

Gold was then at a premium of 12¾ per cent.

In this and other statements I make no mention of the fractional currency nor subsidiary silver.

The amount of United States notes outstanding and in the Treasury May 1, 1878, was $346,681,016
Amount of gold in the Treasury 137,045,240
Amount of silver coin and bullion 14,743,898
Amount of national-bank notes outstanding 321,709,559

Making a total of 820,179,713

Gold to-day is at a premium of ⅜ of 1 per cent., with $15,413,228 more of currency and coin than on January 14, 1875.

To repeal the resumption act would leave us the volume of circulating medium for the country, the United States notes outstanding and in the Treasury at present of $346,681,016
The outstanding national-bank notes 321,709,559

A total of 668,390,575 00

To leave the resumption act operative, as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Finance, would give the country on the 1st day of January, 1879, when specie payments would be resumed—

The amount of United States notes then outstanding and in the Treasury, say $340,000,000
National-bank notes outstanding then 325,000,000
Gold in the Treasury 180,000,000
Silver in the Treasury 25,000,000

A total of 870,000,000
And the national banks will hold then of coin, (not counting their coin Treasury certificates,) at least. 15,000,000
Amount of gold in the country besides 70,000,000
Amount of silver in the country besides 35,000,000

Making a total of 990,000,000

Under a repeal of resumption the available volume of circulating medium would be on the first day of January, 1879, six hundred and sixty-five millions, and gold necessarily advanced in premium, while simply amending the resumption act as proposed by your committee would give the country then as its available volume of circulating medium, composed of gold, silver, and currency at equivalent value with gold, a total of $990,000,000.

The quickest and doubtless the surest way to bring about an increase of the circulating medium, equal to the wants of the people, and ample to impart life to the now prostrate energies of the nation, and to restore commercial confidence to every avenue of industry and trade, is to provide for such increase as the pending amendment will; and, as auxiliary, for the further advance of value of United States notes, to place them at par with gold at the earliest practicable moment.

This desideratum is sought by the measure proposed by your committee. One feature looks at once to this. The exchange at par, as it provides, of these notes for 4 per cent. bonds which are purchasable only in coin, and are to-day in market above par in coin, will immediately advance their value. These notes then reissued in retiring bonds bearing 5 and 6 per cent. interest, will lessen to that extent the interest-bearing obligations of the nation, and measurably strengthen the public credit. The amount of 4 per cent. bonds authorized is ten hundred millions. The amount already sold is less than one hundred millions, leaving still issuable over nine hundred millions. Funding a like amount of ten hundred millions equally of 5 and 6 per cent. outstanding bonds into these four percents, will be a saving to the Government of fifteen millions of interest annually. Besides, the 4 per cent. bonds, taken at home and in denominations of $50 and multiples, will not only enter into current exchanges but enrich rather than impoverish the nation to the extent of the accruing interest paid to our own people, instead of to holders abroad. This desirable object will be hastened by making these bonds exchangeable for United States notes, for their sale is less rapid in coin. This process of exchange will quicken as soon as the right is given, and the authorized issue of these bonds ere long be exhausted. It will become the people's loan to the Government, and be so popular that authority for additional issues will be demanded, until our own people instead of foreigners shall hold the public debt, and the interest wholly be drawn at home rather than shared abroad.

The late sale of fifty millions of 4½ per cent. bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury at a premium of 1¼ per cent. in gold, with accrued interest, is an assurance of this as well as evidence of an advancing public credit. The remarkable financial condition of France, so recently emerging from a disastrously exhaustive war, is largely attributable to her public debt being held by her own people. A measure which provides for the exchangeability of non-interest for low-interest bearing obligations of the Government upholds the value of the one and strengthens the holders of the other. This feature of the amendment proposed, must commend itself to general support.

I may now consider the second feature of the amendment, that United States notes shall, on and after the 1st day of October next, be receivable for duties on imports. By the act approved February 25, 1862, it was provided "that all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued, and by law receivable in payment of public dues." These notes referred to were Treasury notes payable on demand to the amount of sixty millions, issued and made receivable in payment of public dues under the acts approved July 17 and August 5, 1861, and February 12, 1862. It was a fatal mistake that the policy of receiving United States notes was not continued under subsequent statutes, that the country might have escaped the misfortune which has followed its denial. It was, however, the judgment of our lawmakers in the midst of a civil war, when eleven States in rebellion threatened the dismemberment of the Union and the national credit, as a consequence, had suffered so that our bonds were negotiated with difficulty, that it was essential to assure their interest paid in coin to induce capitalists to take them, and this was done by requiring duties to be paid in coin, and by making subsequent issues of United States notes non-receivable for that purpose. Sixteen years of unflinching adherence to this statutory pledge has witnessed United States bonds gradually rise from fifty-five cents to one hundred and eight, the market value of six percents to-day.

The original creditors of the nation, who staked their capital on the issue of fratricidal war, have been well paid for the faith they placed in the final triumph of a just cause. They loaned their money to the imperiled Government with low credit; they gather their reward of large premiums from an impregnable nation with high credit. Tested in civil war and fiscal panic, with gold reaching as high as 285 on the 11th day of July, 1864, and falling to its present paltry premium of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent., and through this ordeal with an unwavering fidelity; good faith ends now to foreign holders of our bonds at 108, and duty to our citizens demands that they shall no longer suffer with forced use of paper driven below par by Government discredit. Long years of stagnation in all branches of business, entailing loss of fortunes and casting dismay into thousands of households, visiting want to countless laborers, whose cry for work and bread the golden seats of customs answer, with the remorseless siren, "Keep sacred the national faith," has no longer plea or defense. With bonds at a premium of 8 per cent. and United States notes but $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. below gold, where is the man so fastidious as to further insist that payment of customs dues in gold is longer necessary to maintain the public faith. Our obligations to holders abroad having ceased, duty to citizens at home requires that the Government they periled and sacrificed life to perpetuate shall now turn its attention to upholding its credit with its own people. The Government should now provide for receiving for all public purposes what it obliges individuals to take for all private transactions. While gold was at a large premium, nearly if not quite equal to that on bonds, there was force in the argument that there should be some certain, reliable source of supply to the Treasury of coin to pay the interest on the public debt; for without it the Government might find itself embarrassed to meet express obligations; but with United States notes nearly equal to gold the argument falls and the disparity should end. The people have been willing to bear with patient fidelity a discrimination against themselves for the public faith, but they will no longer brook a discriminating burden when it antagonizes the public welfare. The plea, moreover, cannot be urged that if customs dues are not paid in coin the Government will be compelled to buy at disadvantage in open market to provide for coin obligations. At what disadvantage, then, I ask? The competition in market of thousands of importers daily bidding for coin to pay the duties on their invoices, which of itself kept up and active the premium, would end by liberty to pay in United States notes. There would then be but one competitor. The Government would be the sole purchaser and substantially dictate its own terms, and premium, if any, would be nominal.

The nation cannot longer with credit forego removal of discredit on all of its legal-tender notes for the paltry saving of three-eighths of 1 per cent. on the amount required to pay the interest on the public debt, and hope to escape general reproach. No fears need be apprehended that the Government may have to seek supply of coin abroad. The annual product of coin in the country is $84,000,000. The annual interest on the public debt is $91,674,544. Under the provisions of the act remonetizing silver there will soon be an average outstanding of silver certificates in circulation more than equal to the interest due to holders of bonds by our citizens, and sufficient of these could readily be secured for such semi-annual interest obligations; so that, in every conceivable aspect, the necessity for denying United States notes their rightful place in circulation has departed and it is proposed now that full value to them shall be imparted.

I will now briefly consider the last feature of the amendment reported by your committee, that all United States notes in existence October 1, 1878, whether in the Treasury or outstanding, shall thenceforth become a permanent portion of the money of the country and to be reissued from time to time as received, so as not to be withdrawn from exchanges and trade nor permanently hoarded by the Treasury. This repeals so much of the resumption act as requires the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem of United States notes 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes issued to old or new banking associations, and leaves whatever amount of greenbacks there may then be in the Treasury and outside, a permanent part of the total currency of the country.

The remedy for the evils and distress growing out of the sudden financial collapse of 1873 was the subject of general discussion and congressional debate, which finally crystallized in the passage of a bill by Congress providing for a moderate and fixed increase of national-bank notes to the volume of greenbacks and national-bank currency then in existence, which bill failed to receive the approval of President Grant.

The law of January 14, 1875, followed as a compromise between the contending advocates of expansion and contraction, and as the way devised for a return to commercial restoration through eventual resumption. This compromise measure, requiring a redemption of United States notes to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes as fast as thereafter issued, authorized an expansion of 20 per cent. to the volume of both forms of currency as fast as national-bank notes were issued in supplying the demands of the people. The measure repealed the monopoly of national banking by making it free to all. It provided for the use of silver for fractional currency, and fixed the day for final resumption of specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879.

As an advocate in 1873 of a moderate increase of the currency, the utilization of silver, free banking, United States notes receivable for duties, preference for United States notes in place of national-bank notes for our currency, and against contraction of these greenbacks, and opposed to fixing any day for forced resumption, I notwithstanding gave my aid in framing and support in passing that compromise measure. It was the best then obtainable and as fair a concession of antagonizing opinions as was practicable, and as the exigency of national condition demanded should be met by patriotic legislators who could rise above individual preference to enact some provision, rather than none, for the common weal.

Whatever may be respective opinions now of the wisdom of that measure, it afforded benefits which the people will not undervalue. It ended what they regarded an odious monopoly of banking and opened the best system ever devised by man to universal participation. It provided for the circulation of silver for fractional uses which served as the forerunner of the final restoration of silver to former equality with its more favored ally, gold. It also named a day in the future when the Government would add another evidence of its time-honored purpose, in peace as in war, even at great sacrifice, to maintain the public credit inviolate.

When the act passed, the amount of outstanding United States notes was $382,000,000; the amount of national-bank notes was $351,861,450; and gold stood in the market at 112¾. To-day the amount of outstanding United States notes is $346,681,016, and national-bank notes $321,709,559, with gold at 100¾.

The whole amount of United States notes redeemed by the measure is $35,318,984, and the whole amount of national-bank notes issued since its passage is $44,148,730. During twelve months past the redemption of United States notes has been $14,813,388, and national-bank notes issued during the same time $18,516,735. Upon this basis between this and October next, say five months, there would be $7,723,635 of national-bank notes issued, and $6,172,245 of United States notes redeemed, leaving as the fixed volume of currency thereafter in United States notes and national-bank notes $669,942,865 against $733,861,450, the volume when the resumption act was passed.

Resumption of specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879, three months thereafter, will unlock and render available to the country—

United States Treasury notes	$340,000,000
National-bank notes	325,000,000
Gold in the Treasury	180,000,000
Silver in the Treasury	25,000,000
Coin in banks and country	120,000,000

making an aggregate volume of nine hundred and ninety millions of different forms of money of equivalent value available for the business needs of the country; and this amount instead of $733,861,450 greenbacks and national-bank notes which made up the volume of a depreciated currency at the date of the passage of the resumption act; and $321,609,425 more than the volume of Treasury and national-bank currency to-day.

On the threshold of such relief, and with its welcome benefits already animating the heart and invigorating the body of the nation, why cast our woful faces over the past, which now cannot be changed, and why turn our backs upon the future, which now can be shaped, in a reversal of present light, and hope, and help, by repeal of the measure under which we have been led so nearly out of our sea of trouble? Pass this complemental aid to the resumption law, and the remedy for our commercial paralysis and financial distress will be at hand.

Already its anticipated force is felt in the livelier step of toil and busier mart of traffic. Make it authoritative and real, and the rock will be struck that shall gratefully supply a languishing people. Mr. President, it may be said, if this remedy is to be found through the aid of the pending amendment, why not make it sooner effectual by fixing an earlier day than October 1 next for it to be operative? Why not fix it July 1, instead of October 1, or even at the passage of the pending measure, as already suggested by the amendment submitted by the Senator from Indiana? July 1 would be a very natural period to fix upon, as it is the beginning of the fiscal year. My individual choice would be then, rather than any period later. There are, however, reasons for choosing October which are entitled to much consideration. The argument that there would be less contraction of United States notes, if July instead of October was chosen, has force. The estimated contraction based on past twelve months' redemption would be to July, say two months, $2,468,898, and to October, say five months, $6,172,295. This comparatively small reduction of the volume of greenbacks is hardly to be considered, in the light of the effect for resumption purposes it might have upon the considered resources of the Treasury. To receive greenbacks for duties three months earlier, would not only make it easier and cheaper for the syndicate to supply the fifty millions of gold recently contracted for by the Secretary of the Treasury, but be to that extent a check upon the flow of gold from customs into the Treasury. United States notes would in that event be paid for duties during the three months, and lessen, by that amount, the gold that would otherwise be accumulated. This would apply with greater force to any period earlier even than July.

The ability with actual means to resume specie payments is of far more significance than a question of three months' time, and the small resultant reduction of the currency, when viewed in the light of the release by resumption of all the gold of the country to form a part of and swell the volume of the circulating medium. The question narrows down to one simply of policy, not of principle; it is an item of time, in place of a surety against disability. Practically, I question if there will be any difference whether United States notes are made receivable for duties October 1, or July 1, for I believe that on the passage of this measure greenbacks and coin will be at par before July 1 next, and the matter of difference of time as to value of notes be disposed of in advance. At the same time prudence and wise forethought demand that reasonable precaution be observed, when a period is to be ushered that is to make all forms of money of equivalent and permanent value.

That I do not overdraw this effect of what seems already to have influenced the public mind, I have but to refer to successive notices in the public prints of business firms and banking associations in various localities and States, acting upon what appears to them the inevitable, by announcing that they have resumed specie payments in advance of the time fixed for resumption by the Government. It is a gratifying concession to this auspicious event, that moneyed circles of the West and South, which sections were the early and persistent advocates of what eastern centers termed "irredeemable paper," "rag money," and "debased coin," are the first to vindicate their faith by acts, and are unfurling in the face of Wall street's bated breeze the nation's financial banner, inscribed "greenbacks as good as coin." Wall street growls and halts at the advancing era, borne aloft by berated "lunatics" and "idiots," but it must learn the irrevocable lesson that all knowledge on finance does not dwell solely with the wise men of Gotham. The country is acting upon the conviction that on money questions all sections as well, are wiser than one center, and that all men, know more than any corner of men. New York City, so clamorous during the many dreary years of perplexity and loss, for early resumption, seems the last to respond to the welcome advent. The city of Albany and others which adorn that empire State are promptly meeting the inevitable by exchanging currency at par for coin. How long will our metropolitan city cling to her $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.? New Orleans, Mobile, Atlanta, Louisville, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, Saint Louis, and other cities feel the impulse to break down the barrier by treating the currency equal to coin.

This early movement of individuals and associations to resume springs from the conviction, which is becoming wide-spread, that the Government will on the 1st day of January next be abundantly able to resume, and to maintain resumption thereafter. Forty per cent. of coin to the volume of currency is an average of reserve considered by wisest financiers as sufficient to maintain specie payments, and the Treasury will have on the day of resumption over two hundred millions of coin to maintain its three hundred and forty millions of Treasury notes, while the banks will hold sufficient of Treasury notes and coin, with which to maintain their three hundred and twenty-five millions of bank-notes.

With an annual product of eighty-four millions of coin and a balance of trade in our favor of $151,152,094, for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for the last nine months ending April 1, 1878, $203,229,501, being $48,453,509 more than the corresponding months ending April 1, 1877, who will hesitate to resume, and who can fear resumption? In the presence of these favoring facts, that assure ample resources with which to warrant a return to specie payments and our ability to maintain them, there can be no reasonable nor financial grounds for now taking any backward step.

Every principle of sound policy invites the intelligent reviewer of our financial condition to move in hand with these facts, by approving a measure which will settle our finances upon such a substantial basis as shall relegate the money question from the Halls of Congress to the marts of commerce.

It is far from wise to halt now, to recount and arraign what has been done, or to restate what might have been done. It is with the present we have to deal. Like the evils of the war, the results of the panic will gradually disappear. It were as profitless to dwell upon the sacrifices of the one, as to recall the misfortunes of the other, for a panacea to cure the ills of the present. How much soever we may differ as to what might have been, we certainly should agree upon what is to be. The past we cannot unmake, but the future is ours to shape. Disagreement now upon comparatively non-essentials, when agreement is so vital in fixing at this opportune moment what shall be permanent relief to the people, will be well-nigh criminal indifference to the prostrate appeal of a suffering nation. Union of moderate views when extremes are nearly met, is safer than to divide upon points which under other conditions it might be duty to maintain. The silver bill is an instance of extreme views harmonizing upon a moderate basis. It is now accepted with grateful testimony of approval by many who feared its passage would widen the breach of our difficulties. Its salutary effects are seen on every hand in the confidence it inspires as an efficient factor in the final solution. Silver certificates—the most beautiful specimens of note-engraving art, are to permeate our countless exchanges and become the favorite token of our restoration. The greenback advancing so nearly in value to coin will yet distance its silver companion and command a premium for portable convenience over ponderous coin. I cite as proof from the New York Times of the 26th of last month this paragraph:

PAYING A PREMIUM FOR GREENBACKS.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25.—In this city recently small sums of greenbacks have been purchased for gold coin at a premium of fifty cents for over $1,000 in notes.

Greenbacks will then, if not before, put to blush such as have aimed to disparage those who have long plead for their placement in the honored paths of trade. No one then, as heretofore, will seriously doubt the feasibility and safety of allowing greenbacks to be received for duties.

To make doubly certain a sufficient supply of coin in the Treasury to meet accruing interest on the public debt, there are still some who are indifferent to the act of discredit upon these notes, by refusal to receive them for all public as well as private uses. It seems to matter but little to them that between citizens they are made to serve every moneyed purpose, while between citizen and Government, they are denied for certain uses, validity and value. No individual upholds his commercial standing who impairs in any way his own promissory paper; nor can a Government keep its financial honor unsullied by discrediting in any manner its obligations. The time is propitious, and the opportunity rare, for every Senator to record his disapproval of this financial anomaly, by the support of a measure which looks to early release from this national dishonor. This amendment may not be just what each Senator would frame, but may it not be such a one as most can unite upon and support? It leans not to either extreme of financial opinion, but is poised on moderate views, and framed by mutual concession. It breathes the spirit of our institutions, for it is the growth of compromise. It deals with a question affecting every fiber of commercial and industrial life. It is more or less vital to every citizen. It concerns the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the idler and the toiler. It touches the relations of capital and labor. It advances or retards the prosperity of the nation, and strengthens or relaxes the bonds of the Union. Your committee therefore invite the Senate to consider and concur in the amendment submitted.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, it is not my intention to detain the Senate on this occasion at any great length. There are some circumstances, however, connected with the subject before us which cannot fail to arrest general attention. When Congress convened in October last, now more than six months ago, the public mind was in a state of anxious hope and expectation. For nearly five years the course of business and the interests of labor had been rapidly declining. From time to time it had been announced by those who assume superior wisdom upon this subject that the bottom, as they are pleased to call it, had been reached. There can be no doubt at least that great financial depression and distress had been fastened upon the country. No channel of active business and no branch of industry had escaped.

It was natural, therefore, when the representatives of the people, having entire control over the finances of the country, met in the discharge of their official duties, that relief should be expected from their action. All eyes were turned upon them. Every ear listened for the sounds that emanated from here; and every heart beat high with hope of redress. Let us inquire how far these expectations and hopes have been fulfilled. Two measures of overwhelming importance to the interests of the people were at once introduced in the House of Representatives and promptly passed.

It was determined by that body without delay that the coinage of the American silver dollar, known in the history of this Government from its foundation, should be restored, in quantities limited only by the amount of bullion which could be procured. The struggle over that question and the result which followed have passed into history. Another question, however, of far greater magnitude was acted upon by the House at the same time. The repeal of the act of January 14, 1875, known as an act to provide for the resumption of specie payments, has been a prominent issue in the American mind almost from the day of its passage. Its influences upon every element of prosperity were soon discovered to be pernicious. A paralysis immediately fell upon all the great and active industries of the country.

The object of the law was soon found to be, not the impossible task of procuring a sufficient amount of the precious metals to form the basis of specie resumption, but simply to reduce, retire, cut down, and destroy the amount of money in circulation in the hands of the people until it approximated the comparatively small amount of gold which we had in our possession or which it was possible for us to obtain. In pursuing this purpose the amount of human misery, of individual wretchedness, of destitution, of crime, of vice, of the destruction of property values, of the overthrow of wealth-producing establishments of industry is simply beyond the power of language to describe. It is conceded on all hands that in this attempt to reduce the volume of our circulation in order to reach what is called a specie basis the shrinkage in the values of property—that is to say, the absolute destruction of values—has reached the enormous and appalling sum of over ten thousand millions of dollars. One-fourth at least of the property of the United States has been absolutely confiscated.

It is not wonderful, therefore, that from the highest to the lowest intelligences the victims of this vast national crime should have very quickly discovered the source of their calamities; nor is it wonderful that they should make such calamities a paramount issue in their judgment upon public men and public measures. Indeed this issue has become far higher than parties; it is an issue in which the interests of the people are so vividly involved that party lines are almost invisible in the gloom of a common distress. It is nevertheless true, however, that parties have spoken in their highest organized capacity on this subject. It will not be forgotten by the American people that in June, 1876, at the city of Saint Louis, the democratic party in national convention, with authorized delegates from every State and congressional district in the Union, declared in favor of the repeal of this odious and crushing measure.

The House of Representatives, therefore, recorded the popular will, ascertained in many ways and by the highest authority, when on the 23d day of November last it passed the act repealing the act of January 14, 1875, and for which the Finance Committee of the Senate has recently reported a substitute. Since the passage of that act in the House public expectation has been turned on this body. From that time to this the responsibility has rested here. Had there been a prompt and immediate concurrence on the part of the Senate with the action of the House, how much loss, bankruptcy, and suffering would have been averted during the last five dreadful business months can of course never be estimated. During the protracted debate which took place here on the silver bill it was a striking feature of the enormous number of petitions that were presented in this body that they invariably coupled two prayers together, one for the restoration of the silver dollar and the other for the repeal of the resumption act. Not a day passed that these two prayers were not heard here at our desk from the highest business interests and the most intelligent people in the United States. Their cry was unceasing and for immediate relief. They did not obtain it. The opponents of the repeal of the resumption act have pleaded for delay and dealt in assurances that soon all occasion for such repeal would pass away.

They have dealt in pleasing prophecies in regard to the revival of business and the employment of idle, starving laborers which have all failed to come true. Their newspaper organs have sought to delude the country by constant proclamations of healthy reactions in business which have not taken place. They have persistently declared that the worst was over; that, having sounded all the depths and shoals of financial disaster and there being no new bottoms in the great deep of universal ruin for us to fathom, the tendency hereafter must necessarily be upward. These false prophets are also opposed to all discussion. They are now deploring the fact that this great question of the people's rights has been again brought up in the Senate. They represent the only class in the United States that is now filled with comfort, that lives without toil, and draws its sustenance from the hard-earned stores of others. Of course the members of this class do not wish to be disturbed. Why should they?

The drone in the hive, living on the honey accumulated by the laboring bee, never desires the manner of his life inquired into or the question of his support agitated. Those who live in violation of the rights of others have, in all ages and countries, been the fiercest opponents of free speech and the principal sufferers by its fearless exercise.

Let us see, however, whether the worst is over, as we are so loudly assured. Let us see whether, while we have been delaying action, the business interests of the country have been improving or not. Let us hold a brief consultation and determine whether, while we have been waiting with wise looks and vain auguries for the patient to revive, that patient has not been actually bleeding to death before our eyes. Within the last few days I have examined the report of the Mercantile Agency of New York, keeping a record of the business failures of the United States for the first three months of the present year. It contains an appalling exhibition. During the three months of January, February, and March the number of failures is put at thirty-three hundred and fifty-five and the amount of their liabilities at the startling sum of $82,078,826. If we compare that report with the same period of time during the last year we find the liabilities growing out of bankruptcies to be $27,540,856 greater in the first quarter of 1878 than in the first quarter of 1877. A similar comparison with the first quarter of the year 1876 shows the bankrupt liabilities of the country to have increased $17,434,670 from that time to the present. If we should carry this comparison back to the period when our volume of circulation was at its very greatest, during the inflated years of 1863, 1864, and 1865, we will find that during those entire three years the aggregate amount of liabilities for all the commercial failures in the United States reached only the sum of $34,103,000, but little more than one-third of the amount growing out of the same causes in the last three months.

In the mad and determined effort to reach what is denominated a specie basis do Senators pause to reflect on the awful penalty which the people have been forced to suffer in order to attain that object? However desirable an object may be, however much the human heart may long for what it conceives to be a great good, yet there may be sacrifices so horrible required in its pursuit that they would render that good an unmixed evil. The resumption of specie payments has been proclaimed the height of American statesmanship; and yet to attain it the prosperity of the country has been trodden into the dust and battered out of all shape and recognition. Within the last three months, as I have shown, the pursuit of this policy has rendered impossible the payment of nearly a hundred millions of debts. The poverty, the desolation, the indescribable private sorrows of families which these failures have cost can never be expiated; nor will the policy which caused them, with its track of ruined lives, ever be forgotten or forgiven by the American people.

The servile castes of the East Indies, with a blind and ignorant faith, worship the Juggernaut, and feel no resentment when mangled and crushed by their hideous deity. It is not so, nor will it ever be, with the American people. They will not worship at a cruel, heartless shrine. They will rather teach their children and their children's children to execrate the authors of their misfortunes. Heretofore there has always been a strong traditionary sentiment in the American mind in favor of a circulation based on gold and silver, but henceforward that idea will be so deeply and painfully associated with bankruptcy, poverty, unemployed labor, and begging tramps, that it will take fifty years of the most favorable experience to restore the former belief on this subject. An education on the subject of the finances has been impressed upon the American people during the last five years as frightful in the memory which it has left as the embraces of a nightmare.

Men and women think fast and take long and rapid strides in opinion when crowded by the spur of starvation. Such circumstances engender revolutions and breed the fierce disorders of the world unless they are controlled by measures of relief and pacification.

We are met, however, at this time by those who oppose the repeal of the resumption act with the fact that our paper circulation is quoted in the money markets at only a small fraction below par in gold. This is held up to us as practical resumption. The money power, turning its back upon the ruin it has wrought, and ignoring the wide-spread suffering it has inflicted, now calls out exultingly that it has at last reached the destination for which it has caused so many millions to water their bread with tears. It is true that the legal-tender United States note, known as the greenback dollar, partly by reason of its contraction in amount, and far more by reason of the confidence which the people have in it as money, has forced itself, in the face of calumny and fixed hostility on the part of the Government, to a substantial equality with gold. This is not the result of any financial statesmanship.

It has taken place in spite of a policy directly adverse to it. It is simply the result of a public opinion upholding a currency which this Government has assailed with discredit from the hour of its creation. Its quoted value to-day, in that little den of gamblers, known as the gold room, in Wall street, rests to no extent at all upon the fact, or supposed fact, that the holders of it are able or desire to obtain specie in exchange. Does that noisy mob in a room in New York, where gold is never seen, where money of any kind is purely an imaginary article, and where the jargon of puts and calls signifies only words and not things—does this mob fix the value of our legal-tender currency as it is circulating now from hand to hand among the plain farmers, mechanics, merchants, and traders of the entire country? It is well known by the people that its functions and services as money in their midst do not depend upon the ability of Government to redeem it with coin, nor do they want it redeemed. Of the $348,000,000 of legal-tender note circulation this Government could not redeem $50,000,000 within a week's notice. What, then, has brought a paper currency for which there is now practically no specie basis up to par with specie? I can answer. It is because public opinion has forced this Government, step by step, to treat its own currency with respect, with fairness, and with honor. It is owing to that public sentiment which has been for years past urging, and at last with the promise of success, that the Government shall receive the money it has authorized to circulate among the people for all its own debts, dues, and obligations, except in the face of an express stipulation to the contrary.

Sir, in point of fact there never was the slightest reason in justice why the paper circulation of this country should have become depreciated. When the legal-tender note was first authorized as money, if we had said it was good money, and by our acts convinced the world of our sincerity, it would have maintained an equality with the precious metals from the beginning. This has been the history of other governments, and it would have been our history if capital had been capable of a single throb of patriotism when it was called on to assist in the preservation of the Union. If money had volunteered as the soldier did, or if tempting bribes, in the shape of gigantic speculations, had not been necessary to win its support, the evils which have since befallen us would never have been known. Had the act of February, 1862, which authorized the first issue of bonds and of legal-tender notes become a law in the form in which it passed the House of Representatives, the depreciation of American currency never would have taken place. It has been in our power ever since to cure this evil.

There has not been a day from the creation of the United States note as a circulating medium to this hour when that note would not have been placed at par by a law requiring the Government to receive it for Government dues. All this was pointed out with overwhelming force by Thaddeus Stevens, then chairman of Ways and Means in the House. Sir, a curious spectacle is presented in this connection. With what a clamorous outcry the great capitalists have assailed a depreciated currency! No language has been sufficiently bitter or contemptuous with which to stigmatize and cover it with shame. No wholesale slaughter of popular interests has been too great in order to get rid of it. And yet the very men who now tax the air with their loud and incessant complaints and demand such crushing sacrifices of the people are solely and exclusively responsible for the fact that we have had a depreciated currency at all. They alone of all the world demanded that this Government should dishonor its own currency. When in 1862 the act creating our bonded system of debt and the means to pay it had passed the House, making principal and interest payable in United States legal-tender notes, and had been returned with the Senate amendment fixing the payment of the interest in coin, Mr. Stevens at once fastened the responsibility and its consequences where they belonged and drew a picture of unhallowed greed which has never been disputed. On that occasion he said:

I have a melancholy foreboding that we are about to consummate a cunningly devised scheme which will carry great injury and great loss to all classes of people throughout the Union, except one. With my colleague, I believe no act of legislation of this Government was hailed with as much delight throughout the whole length and breadth of this Union by every class of people without any exception as the bill which was passed and sent to the Senate. Congratulations from all classes, merchants, traders, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers, poured in upon us from all quarters. The boards of trade from Boston, New York, Saint Louis, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Louisville, Chicago, and Milwaukee approved its provisions and urged its passage as it was. I have a dispatch from the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him to me, urging the speedy passage of the bill as it passed the House. It is true there was a doleful sound came up from the caverns of the bullion brokers, and from the saloons of associated bankers. Their cashiers and agents were soon on the ground, and persuaded the Senate with but little deliberation to mangle and destroy what it had cost the House months to digest, consider, and pass. They fell upon the bill in hot haste, and so disfigured and deformed it that its very father would not know it. Instead of being a beneficent and invigorating measure, it is now positively mischievous. It has all the bad qualities which its enemies charged on the original bill, and none of its benefits. It now creates a money, and by its very terms declares it a depreciated currency. It makes two classes of money; one for the bankers and brokers, and another for the people. It discriminates between the rights of different classes of creditors, allowing the rich capitalist to demand gold, and compelling the ordinary lender of money on individual security to receive notes which the Government has purposely discredited.

And again in the same debate Mr. Stevens said:

The first purchase of gold by the Government will fix the value of these notes which we issue and declare to be a legal tender. The sale will fix their value at 10, 15, or 25 per cent. discount, and then every poor man when he buys his beef, his pork, and his supplies must submit to this 15 or 25 per cent. discount, because you have said that shall be the value of the very notes which you have made a legal tender to him, but not a legal tender to those who fix the value of these very notes.

I have quoted these utterances of a very able and distinguished man not merely because of the weight given to them by his name, nor because they are new as authority on this subject, but simply because they declare a great historical fact from which all our financial miseries have sprung and which cannot be too often repeated and pressed home upon the minds and consciences of American taxpayers. I quote them also to expose the hypocritical lamentations of those who having effected the depreciation of the currency for their own selfish ends, then denounced it as unworthy and dishonest. The organized capital of the country having contrived to fix legal-tender United States notes at a discount of from 25 to 40 per cent., then used them at their face with which to buy into the pockets of the people, and every bond now paid or hereafter to be paid is simply a redemption by the people, dollar for dollar, in coin, of the depreciated paper originally invested in bonds. A system of finance that discredited its own money at the bidding of "bullion-brokers and associated bankers," in order that the capitalists of the country might so invest that discredited money as to compel the laboring classes to redeem it at par in gold and silver, was indeed, as it was so forcibly described, "a cunningly devised scheme, and fraught with great injury, and great loss to all classes of people throughout this Union, except one."

These, however, are not the only historical circumstances which cause the people to listen with impatience to the complaints urged against the evils of a depreciated currency. They do not overlook the fact that these complaints were never made except in the interest of capital. They were never heard in behalf of the laboring masses to whom this currency has at all times been a legal tender; nor were they ever heard in behalf of that class of American citizens whose services and whose claims are paramount to all others. When the muster of millions took place for the preservation of the Union; when the young, the strong, the brave, and the hopeful came from their homes from one ocean to the other and formed in legions under the flag, not a whisper was ever heard to emanate from the money centers, from the cold, hard lips of capitalists, that a depreciated and dishonored currency was not good enough to pay them for their blood and their lives. This money then paid the most sacred obligations ever contracted by a government in all the expanded realms of history. It paid the soldier and the sailor for all the perils and horrors of war. It paid their widows and orphans for all the sorrows of bereavement. Even, therefore, if the authors of the original depreciation were compelled, as the soldiers of the Union and the tax-paying laborers of the country were, to reap some of the fruits of their own cunningly devised scheme, it would still be less than an act of even-handed justice toward them. But no such result will follow the repeal of the resumption act, especially if its repeal is accompanied by the proper and necessary legislation for which bills are now pending in this body.

The repeal of the resumption act, and a law compelling the Secretary of the Treasury to receive without delay United States notes for duties on imports, will at once equalize all our currencies and bring immediate relief to all useful classes. The existence of the act of January 14, 1875, on the statute-books is a standing warning, not only to the Government to contract its circulation, but also to every bank in the United States to do the same, in order to be ready for the demand that will be made upon them for specie in redemption of their notes on and after the 1st day of January, 1879. It is a threat that whoever has an obligation out to pay money on that day, whether it is the Government responsible for its legal-tender notes, or the banks responsible for bank-note circulation, or the citizen liable on his promissory note, shall be subject to a call for payment in coin. It requires but a moment's reflection to perceive the inevitable consequences of such a law. From day to day, working under its provisions, the Government is making preparation to meet its requirements by diminishing as far as possible the currency it will have to redeem.

At this very hour this work is going on. An announcement appears in the public press that legal-tender notes to the amount of $1,167,696 have just been destroyed by order of the Secretary of the Treasury, that being 80 per cent. of the additional bank-note circulation issued during the month of April. The banks have been and continue to be systematically hoarding their circulation, in order that they may be as well prepared as possible to meet the runs for specie redemption that will be made upon them. Private parties who have money to lend in the ordinary way withhold it, except upon such securities and under such circumstances as render them doubly safe, fearing, as they reasonably may, that but few debtors will be able to meet their obligations less than a year hence in coin. The result is that contraction has prevailed in every quarter, and sent forth its deadly influences in every direction. While there is perhaps something over six hundred millions of a paper currency in existence at this time, there are scarcely three hundred millions this hour in the hands of the people aiding the business and labor of the country. Nor will this condition of affairs cease when we have a nominal resumption of specie payments, whether that be now or at the opening of the coming year. To say that we have resumed specie payments because paper money and gold and silver money are quoted as equal in value, is an easy solution to superficial minds. To maintain resumption when specie payments become widely and generally demanded, and of daily occurrence in every branch of business, and in discharge of all obligations, old as well as new, is quite another thing. The Secretary of the Treasury in his recent interview with the House Committee on Banking and Currency admitted that to maintain specie payments it would be necessary to maintain contraction. He admitted in substance that the hoarding system by which the Government and the banks have already taken the life out of the active business of the country will have to be continued. This is the absolute and actual prospect held up to the American people as long as the present law for the resumption of specie payments stands unrepealed. It makes certain a dark, perilous, and unhappy future, linking itself to the present and the past, which have already far too heavily taxed the endurance of the people.

Sir, in addition, however, to the great sum of evils which the financial policy of the Government has fastened on the American people, and which are seen and known of all in their daily contact with them, there is another which has grown up more silently and unnoticed, but which has already reached the most dangerous proportions.

The insufficiency of money in circulation among the people with which to transact business and employ labor has led the farming classes throughout the country, and especially in the West, to adopt the most perilous and desperate expedients to relieve themselves. They have been driven to mortgage their homes to obtain money at usurious rates of interest in order to meet their debts and the ordinary obligations of business. It has been estimated that the loaning associations of the East hold mortgages on western farms to the amount of over $300,000,000. On this enormous sum of borrowed money the interest account will average thirty millions per annum. Such tribute was hardly ever before in the history of the world paid by one class of citizens to another class in the same Government. It could not take place anywhere on the globe except in a land cursed by the most flagrant and wicked class legislation. It could not have fallen like a deadly blight on the agricultural and producing interests of this country but for the fact that all the great powers of the Government have for years past been exerted to foster the gains and swell the profits of idle wealth at the expense of labor. Instead of furnishing to the people a circulating medium equal to their business wants, a policy has prevailed which has driven them to the tender mercies of the money-changers and to lay the title-deeds to their homes on the counters of the broker and the usurer in pawn for a currency that could be obtained in no other way.

And now, with contraction and hoarding still to continue on the part of the Government and the banks, these titles are to be redeemed after the 1st day of January next in coin or be forfeited. In this fact is to be found the meaning of those threats now often made by the organs of the money power, that the ownership of the soil will change, and a system of great landlords and a numerous tenantry be established in our midst after the European models. It means that thousands and hundreds of thousands of the present owners of their farms shall either be dispossessed under decrees of foreclosures or remain as tenants and pay rent to non-resident landlords. It means that a landed aristocracy shall be built up in connection with the moneyed aristocracy which already exists, and that the entire spirit of this Government shall be subverted. It means that those who have always thought the British system of government a better one than our own have successfully laid the foundations and already taken gigantic steps toward the accomplishment of their ideas.

A permanent national debt is their opportunity, and they have embraced it with eager zeal to advance their purposes. In their eyes it is a national blessing, and we never hear from their lips a desire for its liquidation. It is their source of power and of income. In 1688, almost two hundred years ago, the national debt of Great Britain commenced from small beginnings to run its terrible career of oppression, pillage, and pauperism. It has swollen to the awful dimensions of nearly $4,000,000,000. No one contemplates its payment. In the shape of consols, funds, and bonds it presents a refuge in which capital, retired from business, escapes taxation, and at the same time silently but unceasingly sucks the life-blood of the toiling masses. Some of the results which have followed, in connection with the ownership of the soil, are worthy the consideration of the American people at this time. The population of England is estimated at a fraction over 18,000,000. She contains 29,179,622 acres of land that are owned by her citizens. In the last publication of the Financial Reform Association of England the amazing fact appears that 16,352,606 acres of these lands, being largely more than one-half the entire landed property of the country, are owned by the insignificant number of 4,736 individuals. The rental incomes arising from these vast possessions amount to $472,219,645 per annum, thus showing an average ownership on the part of less than 5,000 persons of over 350,000 acres and an annual average income to each of them of about $95,000.

The population of Wales is placed at 1,217,135 souls. The lands held by private ownership amount to 3,833,968 acres; and of these 2,342,922 acres are owned by 672 individuals, with an annual rental income, arising from the labor of a peasantry in a state of semi-starvation, amounting to $12,227,600.

Scotland has a population of 3,359,567 inhabitants. Her lands are estimated at 18,946,694 acres. How incredible it appears to the American mind that 1,758 individuals own 17,584,828 of these acres, nearly all the land of the entire country; and yet such is the fact. The lords and barons of these broad domains draw from the porridge-fed tenantry who cultivate them the sum of $36,463,990 per annum.

The population of Ireland is computed to be 5,409,490. Her lands measure 20,159,678 acres, and 15,604,762 acres are owned by 3,722 individuals, who each year collect a rental income of $37,765,080 from the toiling men and women who inhabit that oppressed and impoverished island. The murder of a landlord a few days ago in Ireland attracted the attention of the civilized world. I have had the curiosity to examine the extent of his possessions, and consequently the extent of his power to oppress the landless poor. The Earl of Leitrim at the time of his death owned in county Donegal, 56,184 acres; in county Leitrim, 21,179 acres; in county Galway, 18,203 acres; and in county Kildare, 53 acres; making a landed estate of 95,619 acres. A general summary of the land-holders of the United Kingdom of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland therefore shows that, while the whole extent of lands reaches 72,119,961 acres and the entire population is 28,227,066, yet the meager number of 10,888 individuals own 51,885,118 acres, more than two-thirds of the lands of the entire kingdom.

Sir, these statistical facts are overwhelming in their significance. They reveal every feature of human servitude and light up all the ghastly lineaments of degradation, famine, and woe. They explain the exodus of the last thirty-five years from Great Britain, during which time seven millions of her subjects have exiled themselves from her shores. I have cited them, however, at this time not for the purpose of dwelling on them, but simply to show to American land-holders who have been forced to mortgage their lands to the money power a condensed and comprehensive view of the end of that career on which they have entered. I desire them to see that the policy of their Government in withholding an adequate supply of money in circulation has forced them into the clutches of a power which to-day holds mortgages on more acres of American farms than the entire lands within the boundaries of England. And I desire in their behalf to appeal to the American Congress to promptly undo, as far as possible, the ruin that has been inflicted, and to inaugurate a financial reformation which will secure to the toiling farmer his imperiled home and to the industrious mechanic living wages.

It is customary, however, at this time for the supporters of the present financial policy of the Government to charge the misfortunes of the people on the people themselves. The extravagance of the people, their reckless expenditures, and their prodigal mode of living are now favorite themes on the tongues of those who recline in the soft lap of wealth and fare sumptuously every day. The hard-handed, sun-burnt millions who rise to their daily tasks while the morning star is yet in the sky and toil for a subsistence until the evening star appears are constantly lectured on the virtues of economy by the dwellers in palaces, by the inmates of gilded mansions, by the masters of liveried attendants, by the lords of millions, by all such as derive their incomes and their luxuries from the labor and privations of others. These modern teachers of self-denial on the part of the laborer have given the meaning of this world instead of the spiritual meaning its sublime author intended to the parable of the ten talents: "For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

The poor are exhorted to give up luxuries which they have not, in order that the rich may add to their already great abundance. Go to the homes of those who eat their bread in the sweat of their faces and ascertain if you can the extravagances in which they indulge. Do they maintain costly equipages, splendid carriages, and richly caparisoned horses? Are their humble dwellings adorned with valuable paintings or fitted up with expensive furniture? Do you see pier-glasses on their walls and feel velvet carpets beneath your feet on their floors? Take a seat with them at their frugal, but hospitable tables. Do you find extravagance there? Where is the solid silverware, the long succession of delicate dishes, the various brands of high-priced wines? None of these things are found to tempt the Epicurean taste of those who, while preaching economy to the industrial classes, sit down each day to banquets such as Dives presided over when Lazarus lay at his gates begging bread. Have the farmers and mechanics of the country brought calamity on themselves by extravagance in dress?

Where one indulges in broadcloth a hundred are glad to be comfortable and appear decent in homespun. Do their wives and daughters wear velvets and expensive silks? Must they, too, economize and put on plainer attire in order that the votaries of fashion and wealth may increase their demands? Sir, the laboring men and women of this country have not been extravagant in their lives, nor do their present embarrassments and sufferings arise from that cause. It is enough that they should be weary with care and toil and filled with anxiety for the still darkening future. They should at least be spared reproachful calumny. They constitute the only economizing, self-denying class of citizens in all this broad land. With what force and justice could they turn upon their accusers and fasten on them the crimes of profligacy and shameless extravagance. The Federal Government itself has been administered for many years past on a scale of the most stupendous expenditures. It has rioted with the public moneys and set an evil example. States, counties, cities, and corporations have too generally defied all the principles of economy in their management. But of all who commit extravagance and practice self-indulgence the most conspicuous is that class which holds the bonds of the Government and the mortgages of the people, and loudly urges its oppressed debtors to the most rigid economy for its own benefit. To those who compose this favored class the pleasures and luxuries of every land and clime are accessible. To them nothing can be denied which money will command. As they travel over oceans and continents in quest of new enjoyments, they are assailed by no anxious fears in regard to their pecuniary resources. They know that the plowman in the furrow, the mechanic in his shop, the American laborer of every kind, and wherever he may be, pays daily tribute and makes their income secure.

Far be it from me to incite the people, even if in my power, to disregard their judicial obligations. No such purpose inspires my conduct, but I shall at all times vindicate them against the aspersions of those who first oppress and then denounce them. And I shall also always maintain that the entire financial policy of the Government should be revised, changed, and reformed in their interests and for their relief.

Are there those upon this floor who regard the financial question a temporary one? To my mind it is not so. Its different phases may be met and for the time being disposed of, but in my judgment it will remain the paramount question in our public affairs long after every eye that now sparkles in this Chamber shall be closed in eternal sleep. Debt is a merciless master, and gives its victims little time and less inclination to consider anything except its ceaseless demands. The American people at this time, aside from their private debts to each other, are indebted to the Federal and State Governments, to counties, cities, and corporations, in the almost incalculable sum of more than $5,000,000,000. The bondage of such a debt cannot be a short one. Generations will come and go before emancipation day for the American tax-payer arrives.

One form of slavery has been swept from American soil. Another form has followed it, not to last so long, let us hope, but equally remorseless and unsparing in its exactions upon labor. It is the slavery of debt. It is upheld by the sanctions of law, but the greatest question of American statesmanship for the next fifty years or more will be its abolition without doing violence to our national honor. Year after year in one form or another that leading idea will press itself on us for solution. Legislative compromises will be made and declared final, but as long as debt continues to make its insatiate demands on the fruits of industry there will be no finality. Nor are the people to be silenced on this vital issue of their own interests by the meaningless, vapid, and insolent cry of communism hurled at them by the agents of the money power. Those who are doing most to engender and foster the spirit of communism in this country are the adherents of the extreme measures of financial contraction and of a forced return to specie payments, regardless of shattered homes, despairing men, wailing women, and outcast children. Revolutions are not created by those who plead for justice, but rather by such as work injustice and rivet the bolts of oppression.

The cry of the sheriff's sale and the flag of the auctioneer selling homes and their contents for debt are far more certain and powerful precursors to a dangerous public opinion than the most inflammatory discussions. Let liberality, justice, and forbearance toward a people in distress prevail and the future will be calm and prosperous. Let the teachings and the warning words of Andrew Jackson be heeded and all will be well. Forty-five years ago he looked upon the United States Bank with its capital of thirty-five millions as full of danger to the rights of the people. How insignificant was the power of organized capital at that time in comparison with its tremendous functions to-day! Yet on the 10th day of July, 1832, in his immortal veto message these were the faithful words of the hero of New Orleans and the expounder of a true democracy:

It is to be regretted that the rich and powerful too often bend the acts of the Government to their selfish purposes. Distinctions in society will always exist under every just government. Equality of talents, of education, or of wealth, cannot be produced by human institutions. In the full enjoyment of the gifts of Heaven and the fruits of superior industry, economy, and virtue, every man is equally entitled to protection by law. But when the laws undertake to add to their natural and just advantages artificial distinctions; to grant titles, gratuities, and exclusive privileges; to make the rich richer and the potent more powerful, the humble members of society, the farmers, mechanics, and laborers, who have neither the time nor the means of securing like favors to themselves, have a right to complain of the injustice of their Government.

There are no necessary evils in government. Its evils exist only in its abuses. If it would confine itself to equal protection and, as heaven does its rains, shower its favors alike on the high and the low, the rich and the poor, it would be an unqualified blessing. * * * Experience should teach us wisdom. Most of the difficulties our Government now encounters, and most of the dangers which impend over our Union, have sprung from an abandonment of the legitimate objects of government by our national legislation and the adoption of such principles as are embodied in this act. Many of our rich men have not been content with equal protection and equal benefits, but have besought us to make them richer by act of Congress. By attempting to gratify their desires we have, in the results of our legislation, arrayed section against section, interest against interest, and man against man, in a fearful commotion which threatens to shake the foundations of our Union. It is time to pause in our career, to review our principles, and, if possible, revive that devoted patriotism and spirit of compromise which distinguished the sages of the Revolution and the fathers of our Union.

If we cannot at once, in justice to interests vested under improvident legislation, make our Government what it ought to be, we can, at least, take a stand against all new grants of monopolies and exclusive privileges; against any prostitution of our Government to the advancement of the few at the expense of the many, and in favor of compromise and gradual reform in our code of laws and system of political economy.

These principles were enunciated nearly half a century ago. They were called forth by the first attempts of consolidated wealth to control the public affairs of this country. With them their great author confronted the incipient steps of the money power to seize upon the legislation of this Government. One national bank with a moneyed influence of perhaps one hundred millions then menaced the rights and interests of the people. Now over two thousand national banks with the control of more than two thousand millions of money represent the gratuities and exclusive privileges which in the language of Jackson "make the rich richer and the potent more powerful." The evil which he sought to destroy at its birth has in our time become a colossal giant, dominant and absolute in every department of the Government. He warned his countrymen against an infant in its cradle, now grown to be a monster whose desolating hoof-prints are to be found invading all the thresholds of industry and business from one ocean to the other. Jackson plead for reform in our financial system when the cloud of danger appeared no bigger than a man's hand in our political sky.

The whole heavens are now black, and nothing save the application of his doctrines will ever again give us a shining sun over our heads. Let us signalize our devotion to these doctrines by an act of legislation for the benefit of prostrate business and destitute labor. The repeal of the law compelling the payment of all debts in coin from and after the 1st day of January next will bring light and hope to millions of darkened homes. It will cut the accursed ligatures of contraction, permit the money of the country, the arterial circulation of business life, to flow again in healthful currents and in natural channels. Paralysis will disappear, activity and prosperity will revive, the dead will come to life, and new sounds will be heard, the sounds of busy, cheerful, happy labor.

No act of this government since the advent of peace at Appomattox, thirteen years ago, has been hailed with such joy as will ring though the land over the repeal of this pernicious law—the deadly upas tree of American legislation. Nor will rejoicings be confined to any one section. A shout of gladness will ascend from every quarter; from the laboring masses of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the entire Atlantic seaboard, as well as from that mighty seat of present and future political and agricultural empire, the Valley of the Mississippi. The coast of the Pacific, too, will respond, and the whole people will once more leap forward under natural laws, and not under artificial restraints imposed by the selfish greed of favored classes. A feeling of contentment and obedience to law will spring up in millions of hearts that are now sore, reckless, and defiant under a sense of wrong. Popular relief will insure public tranquillity, the turbulence of distress in the labor regions will cease, and even the money power itself will at last find that an act of justice to the people, though long delayed and reluctantly conceded, is a good investment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I now call for the regular order; the Calendar of unobjected cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. GORDON. I had desired to speak to-day upon this subject, but I find myself hardly able to go on. I desire to give notice that on Monday I shall ask that this subject be resumed that I may then make my remarks.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose it will be understood that the Senator from Georgia takes the floor on House bill No. 805 for Monday.

Mr. GORDON. I beg then that the floor will be considered as mine on Monday on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over with that understanding.

COMMISSIONERS TO PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, if there be no objection on the part of the Senate, I should like to call up the motion that was made a few days ago to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution amending what is called the Paris exposition joint resolution was indefinitely postponed.

This joint resolution was brought in as an amendment to the joint resolution that fixed the number of commissioners to be paid by the Government at twenty.

The amendment that I offered to the original measure was that each organized State should be allowed one paid commissioner. I afterward offered it in the form of this resolution, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and by them reported adversely, and while I was engaged a few days ago it was acted upon and postponed indefinitely. After that I made a motion to reconsider the vote by which it had been indefinitely postponed, and that is the question that is now, I understand, before the Senate. I should like to have the matter acted upon to-day. The time has come when, if these commissioners go, they will have to leave very soon for their post of duty. I think there is so much justice in this matter that I cannot doubt that the Senate will allow this amendatory resolution to pass.

To be sure, there are a majority of the States now represented on the commission, and if the Senators representing those States should see fit—but I do not think they will do so—to reject this proposition and to not allow the other States to have any such representation, they have the power to do so. I do not think that any of them can be so disposed; and believing that there is much justice in this application I think it is proper that it should be taken up and acted upon now, and that notice might be given in proper time that the commissioners may attend to their duties.

The northwestern States and what may be termed the border States, bordering on the mining country, wish to be represented at this exhibition by men who are allowed something for their expenses while attending to their business; but it has so happened—probably without design—that only two of the border States have had paid commissioners allowed them. Kansas and California are the only States of what may be termed the border States that have any representation in this list of twenty. In this list are left out such States as Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, Texas, and Arkansas. These States and others which I have named certainly are as much entitled to representation as any others.

Objection has been made on the score of expense. If we have gone to the expense of $150,000 for this object, the expenditure of the small sum of $20,000 more in order that the country may be fully represented and fully satisfied that justice is being done to the minority as well as the majority, is fully justified. In other words, if we ought to have given one dollar for this purpose we ought to have given enough to secure equal representation to all the States. This is only a simple provision that a sufficient amount shall be added to the appropriation already made to bear the expense of commissioners from the eighteen States which were left out. I ask that the vote may be taken upon this matter and that the previous action may be reconsidered, because I believe if reconsidered the resolution will be allowed to be passed by the Senate. I cannot help but think it will be so, but at any rate I wish to have the matter left to the representatives here of those States that are provided for. Here I say are a majority of them. The Eastern States are nearly all represented on this commission, and they certainly will not be disposed to leave us out in the cold and to leave us unrepresented when the matter of cost is such a trifling sum compared to the amount we have already voted. I say, then, that I should like to have a vote on this matter and see whether it will not be reconsidered and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) supplemental to a joint resolution in relation to the international industrial exposition to be held in Paris in 1878 was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As it will be recollected, the joint resolution which the Senator moves to reconsider was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and by that committee considered soon after the passage of the bill appropriating $150,000 for the expenses of the Paris exposition. It will be recollected that the resolution the Senator refers to appropriates $21,000 additional. It will also be recollected by the Senate that at the time of the discussion of the original bill the Senator or his colleague, perhaps both, made an appeal to the Senate for the purpose of adding additional paid representatives, so that each State should have a representative of that kind. I agree that in the original bill it would have been proper that each State should have had what is known as an additional or paid representative. But it was not passed in that particular as the Senator desired. Both in the House and in the Senate it was discussed and it was believed that twenty representatives to be paid $1,200 each and two unpaid from each State and each Territory were sufficient.

Of course it is very natural that the Senator should wish a redistribution, inasmuch as his State was left out, as I learn from him, and has not got one of the twenty; but it has two honorary commissioners appointed. It is very natural that Nebraska should ask for an additional number to be appointed; but the Senate will bear in mind that this subject was thoroughly considered at the time, and the Senate declined it, the House declined it, and now we are asked for an appropriation of $21,000 to pay additional representatives, after the subject has passed from both Houses and after the time for the commissioners to be in Paris. Yesterday the exhibition opened and the commissioners ought to be there now if they are to be appointed. I see no use in the reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to correct the Senator, before he sits down, on one thing. This matter was not discussed at the time of the passage of the original measure. I commenced this matter and made this motion long before I knew whether my State would have a paid commissioner or not. I did it in justice to the other States if mine should get one, which justice I ask the Senate now to do in this case.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator is correct in that, but the subject was before the House and before the Senate and discussed at the time the original bill was passed, but perhaps I ought not to refer to what occurred in the House. Certainly, the question whether or not each State ought not to have what is known as a paid commissioner was discussed in the Senate, and the Senate decided that twenty paid commissioners were enough and gave the President and Secretary of State the right to select and appoint those twenty, which has been done, and probably the commissioners are now in Paris, at least some of them.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The subject came up just before the recess was taken for the holidays. I made the motion at the time that it was up that we add the amendment that is proposed now. The Senator who had the measure in charge at that time, the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] appealed to me that we had but a few minutes of the morning hour to spend—so that I stopped the matter right there and let it pass as it was—and that I might bring up my proposition as separate legislation and there was no doubt that it would receive proper favor. The matter was not discussed; we had no time; we had not five minutes to go, at the time; and I yielded.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to say that by reference to the RECORD of that day the Senator will find that I stated that I was opposed to the legislation but that I had no doubt the Senate would consider it. I never said I thought it would favorably consider it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I may do the Senator injustice in saying that he stated he would favor it. I took it that he would probably, from the manner in which it was left, and I know that some other Senators told me afterward that they meant that. I have not since spoken to the Senator from California on the subject. However, that is of very little importance; the question is whether it is right of itself to allow the States equal representation at the Paris exposition. As I said, I did not know then whether my State would be represented on the compensated list or not; but I believed then, and I believe now, that it was either right to have all or to have none represented. If we did not wish to be represented by commissioners in general, we could have had one, a commissioner-general, and then let each person that was exhibiting his products have his own agent. If that had been done, I should have been satisfied; but inasmuch as it was in the bill brought in that a majority of all the States should be represented in this matter, I thought it was proper and right that all the States should have a chance.

Now, if I have shown the Senate that not only my State is left out but that all the border States except two, including the western as well as the eastern border States, have been overlooked or forgotten or in some way have no representation, am I not justified in asking the favorable action of the Senate? I make an appeal to the Senators of the States that are represented to help those States which are unrepresented. If they have a mind to vote the resolution down they can do so in two minutes. If they have a mind to give us a fair representation, it is in their power to do it. Of course we make our appeal to them because we are in the minority. The States that are not represented are in the minority and their votes cannot carry this measure unless some of the others are disposed to aid them. Let the matter be fairly discussed if any one wishes to discuss it, and then let the resolution be passed upon. I have here the list of the States that are favored. I see the State of the Senator from West Virginia has a representative. Of course he has no interest in this matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is true that the State of West Virginia has a representative on the list of paid commissioners; but at the time the Senate acted upon this bill and when I advocated the number twenty, none of us knew where the twenty were to come from. It is true one happens to come from my State, because I take it we had a very proper man to represent us there.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is all right. I have no doubt West Virginia had a good man. I have no doubt they are all good men; but we have not any such representative. Now I appeal to the Senator with others to say whether we shall have one or not. It is for them to say. I only make that allusion to show that they are already provided for; and the question now is whether they will allow others to have the same provision which has been made for them.

The Senator from West Virginia says our States have honorary commissioners. That is true; but they will amount to nothing; and the fact is as to the man we wanted appointed to go from our State that we could not ask him to go as an honorary member; we would not do it because his circumstances are such that he ought not to be asked to do it. I do not know how that may apply to others; but it is so to our State.

I say, then, sir, that this restriction ought to be repealed so far as the list is concerned, or it ought to be added to so that all the States may fare alike. That is all I ask in this matter, and it is all that any of us are asking for—we who are in the minority of the States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should feel very much disposed to comply with any wish expressed by the Senator from Nebraska if in my judgment that wish was at all reasonable; but we have already a much larger representation, as I see from the papers, at the exposition in Paris than any other power on earth; in fact it is a matter of ridicule, as I see from the papers, that this country has sent so many representatives of its interests there. I have seen it stated in the papers that they would not be allowed the privileges of commissioners, that they would be restricted to Governor McCormick and two or three other men. Now this is a proposition to add still further to the list. We have twenty paid commissioners, and some honorary commissioners who are not paid. This proposition is to add some eighteen other paid commissioners to represent us at the Paris exposition. The whole thing is unnecessary. The exposition has now commenced and whatever arrangements commissioners could have made for the people of their respective States have already been made. This matter, therefore, is entirely unnecessary at the present moment. Whatever necessity there might have been or whatever excuse there might have been for such a motion heretofore, that time has passed away, and hence I can see no necessity for pressing this matter. I would vote for the motion to reconsider if it was possible for the Senator from Nebraska to show any valid reason why the joint resolution should pass, but in my judgment no argument in favor of its passage can be submitted which ought to weigh to influence the vote of any member. I hope the Senator will not press the motion to reconsider; but if he does I must be excused for voting against it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I feel like pressing the joint resolution to a vote, because I want to know whether it is to be voted down or not. If it is to be voted down, it might as well be voted down to-day as at any other time. I think the time has come when we should have our representatives notified if they are to be sent to the exposition.

I wish to mention here, and I do so without believing a word of it, something in regard to what the people think in the country about these matters. Just after I introduced the joint resolution some of the papers in the country took it up and said that time would be lost in discussing a question of this kind; that such an amendment to the original resolution would never be gotten through; that twenty made a majority of thirty-eight, and the original resolution had been so ingeniously drawn that it carried the power with it to prevent any amendments. I merely mention this. I do not sympathize at all with any such remark, because I do not believe that it applies to any Senator here. This question, however, will give Senators an opportunity to say whether the majority is willing that the minority may be heard upon this matter and properly cared for. That is all I care to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 16.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be recollected that this question was discussed and decided by the Senate when the original joint resolution was before the Senate. It appears to me Senators hardly recollect the facts connected with it. After this joint resolution was introduced it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it was there properly and fairly considered, as I believe. My recollection is that that committee was unanimous in the opinion that we ought not to make a further appropriation of $21,000 to send additional commissioners to Paris. If there were any necessity and reason for such a provision it ought to have been made at the time the original resolution was considered. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but it appears to me Senators hardly understand the question, or they would not want to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT. The motion, I believe, is to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was indefinitely postponed. I certainly would vote in favor of reconsidering the vote if it were not that the merits of the proposition may be discussed on the motion to reconsider, for I would not wish to cut off the Senator from Nebraska, or any other Senator who desires to do so, from expressing his views in favor of the proposition; but, as it is unnecessary to reconsider the vote in order to allow the reasons to be given in favor of the passage of the resolution, the same considerations that would lead me to vote against the passage of the resolution, if it were reconsidered, induce me to vote against the reconsideration.

There is no doubt that the country is being adequately represented abroad; we certainly have sent sufficient agents to Paris; and it is only a question of locality or a sectional question which would require that there should be an increase in the number of agents. Kansas is represented abroad, I am told; Kansas has just the same interests that Nebraska has; both are agricultural States and belong to the same group, and there is no reason why a man should be on one side of the State line or on the other in representing those States abroad, either in the interests which he would represent or probably in the degree of intelligence which he would bring to the discharge of his duties. The same thing is true of the three Pacific States. They have a large mining industry and more or less an agricultural industry. A man who properly represented one of those States would represent them all; and there is no reason why two more representatives should be added to the Pacific coast, burdening the Treasury. Of course it would be gratifying to Senators to have some one of their constituents from each State selected for this place, but the gratification should not be afforded to them unless there is a useful public purpose to serve; for I hold that we have no more right to spend money from the Treasury of the United States uselessly than we have to throw it into the streets. We are governed necessarily in such matters by a feeling of propriety. Every dollar raised comes from taxation, except a few from miscellaneous sources, and those are the property of the people and should be judiciously expended. If it can be shown that there is a necessity for an increase of the number of these representatives abroad, it would be a good idea to pass the joint resolution, but the desire to have every State represented is not a good argument to my mind to show that there is a necessity to send additional representatives.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator which of the Pacific States has a representative now?

Mr. SARGENT. I was not aware which one until it was stated by the Senator from Nebraska that California has a representative. I have taken no part in the selection of a representative from the Pacific coast, and I did not know in fact whether the Pacific coast had a representative or not.

Mr. HOAR. My question was to an entirely different point, with the view of asking the Senator the further question, what time a delegate from Oregon now appointed, confirmed by the Senate, would probably get there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. He would not have to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. The exhibition began yesterday.

Mr. SARGENT. It would take, allowing almost no time to get ready, thirty or forty days before he could get there.

Mr. HOAR. So that if the joint resolution should be passed the gentlemen who are to represent these States would get there when the exhibition was about half over. That is the point I was about to inquire of.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a very good point, and it is most true in reference to Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to know how much the fitting out of the vessels has already cost the nation?

Mr. SARGENT. I doubt if ever a more expensive scheme of representation of the United States was devised than the one put in operation for the Paris exposition. The question of the Senator is very pertinent. We have paid hundreds of dollars a ton for the transportation of goods to the Paris exposition, upon the idea I suppose that some economy would be practiced by employing naval ships. The Secretary of the Navy, perhaps under a necessity, has taken the school-ships, the ships where we were training the youths to develop the Navy and try to make American seamen. These ships were filling a very useful place in the economy of the Navy. Under the able and intelligent conduct of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting with its present head these ships were being brought to the highest degree of efficiency, and we were yearly graduating out of these school-ships a most valuable class of seamen to take the place of Kanakas and Chinamen and all the lower races of the world which were crowding our Navy. This system is almost broken up on account of the passage of the measure by Congress requiring the use of naval vessels. Furthermore, extensive repairs necessary upon those vessels to fit them for a long and sometimes a dangerous trip across the Atlantic have made the expenditures by the Government of the United States something enormous outside of the appropriation which was made for the exposition.

I do not say that anybody is to blame for this except Congress, but it was a most improvident system. It would have been much better for us to have paid any of the steam vessels which cross the Atlantic and carry regular freight the amount which they charge for the transportation of goods. Ay, sir, that course would have saved hundreds of per cent. on the cost of these articles. It is too late now. It is not worth while now, perhaps, according to the homely old adage, to cry over spilt milk, but I do hope Congress hereafter, if they ever authorize goods to be sent abroad to an exhibition, will remember the experience of 1878 and avoid serious blunders like this.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator state to the Senate, if he can, about how many hundred thousand dollars it will cost the Government?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know that I could approximate the amount. I have seen no report upon the matter. I simply know that it goes up far beyond the amount of the appropriation which Congress thought was sufficient for these incidental expenses, which are paid for out of other funds and out of other appropriations. It goes to cripple the amount that we give to the Navy; it goes to injure the school service of the Navy. There is not a particular in which this feature of the measure is not working deleteriously. I regret it very much. I regret that I myself did not have foresight enough to see that this would be the result. I take the blame to myself as well as I ascribe it to Congress. I certainly have my share of responsibility. But now, sir, after these large expenditures have been made beyond what Congress intended, I think we ought not, when we are adequately represented abroad, to increase the number of paid commissioners. That was my view originally. We are represented to the full extent to the amount that our exhibition abroad will justify, and to add more commissioners now is simply to add to superfluity.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, when this proposition was first introduced, as long ago as the 4th of February, I was quite inclined to favor it; but three months have now passed and we have witnessed in a few days the telegraph dispatch that the French government refuse to receive and acknowledge the large number of commissioners we now have there, amounting to about one hundred and fifty. Under these circumstances, at this late hour, it seems to me hardly worth while to send any more commissioners when those we have there fail to receive any recognition on the part of the French government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Anthony,	Dorsey,	Oglesby,	Spencer,
Bruce,	Kellogg,	Paddock,	Teller.
Cameron of Pa.,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Matthews,	Saunders,

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GORDON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with the accompanying papers, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report to the Senate an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and to ask that the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that a part of the amendment now reported is in writing, but the writing in the margin to which I call attention is a part of the amendment which I am required to report.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations here, and I would ask the Senator from Texas to state whether he makes a favorable report.

Mr. MAXEY. I could not report it as I do from the committee except favorably.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator did not say so, and I ask for information.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated, I designed to state at least, that I was instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make the report.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But the Senator did not say that it was with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MAXEY. It is favorable, of course; otherwise it would not have been made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say in reference to this report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which I am a member, that I dissented entirely from the conclusions of the committee in the matter. I wish simply to announce that while the amendment is reported by a majority of the committee, it did not meet my approval.

EXTENSION OF PATENTS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules of the Senate are instructed to prepare and report to the Senate a rule which shall relieve the Committee on Patents from considering any bill, resolution, or petition for the extension of any patent.

LOCATION OF LAND SCRIP.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. The regular order is the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. Before taking up the Calendar, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives. I will state that this order of business was reached on the Calendar during the absence of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS,] who had an interest in the bill, and by reason of his absence the bill was passed over.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in section 2, line 1, after the word "that," to strike out "all," and in line 2, after the word "settlers," to insert "only;" so as to read:

That such scrip shall be received from actual settlers only in payment of pre-emption claims or in commutation of homestead claims, in the same manner and to the same extent as is now authorized by law in the case of military bounty-land warrants.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have an explanation of the bill. Is there a report accompanying it?

Mr. PLUMB. There is a report accompanying it; report No. 213.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB March 6:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The private land claims which are recognized by this bill, with many others which have been from time to time recognized and adjusted, had their origin prior to the purchase of the province of Louisiana by the United States from France. The treaty of purchase specially recognized the rights of property in the then inhabitants. The third article of the treaty of April 30, 1803, is as follows:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." (8 Statutes at Large, 202.)

This obligation has been repeatedly recognized by Congress, and various acts have been passed from 1806 to 1858 providing for commissioners to hear and determine the claims of parties to lands embraced within the territory thus acquired, and to report lists of such lands as, in the opinion of the commissioners, should be confirmed to the claimants.

Under these several acts lands were, from time to time, confirmed to the respective claimants. The greater portion of these claimants took their lands in place, but some were unable to do so for various reasons, but principally because the United States had disposed of the particular lands to which their claims attached. To remedy this difficulty Congress passed the act of June 2, 1858, (11 Stat. at Large, 295,) providing that "where any private land claim has been confirmed by Congress, and the same, in whole or in part, has not been located or satisfied, either for want of a specific location prior to such confirmation, or for any reason whatsoever, other than a discovery of fraud in such claim subsequent to such confirmation, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of the district in which such claim was situated, upon satisfactory proof that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, to issue to the claimant, or his legal representatives, a certificate of location for a quantity of land equal to that so confirmed and unsatisfied; which certificate may be located upon any of the public lands of the United States subject to sale at private entry at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre: Provided, That such location shall conform to legal divisions and subdivisions."

Congress also, by act of June 22, 1860, (12 Stat. at Large, 85,) the operation of which was extended by acts of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. at Large, 544,) and June 10, 1872, (17 Stat. at Large, 378,) authorized claimants to proceed to establish their claims by petition in the district court, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In cases where claims have been held valid under the statute above cited, and where the court has decreed that the claimants are entitled to enter a specified number of acres of the public lands of the United States subject to entry, or to receive certificates of location for such proportion of the lands decreed to them as has been disposed of by the United States, the bill under consideration authorizes the subdivision of the same into quantities as nearly as practicable conforming to the legal divisions and subdivisions of the public lands of the United States; and also authorizes the assignment of the certificates of location, by written instrument, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owner, including the right to locate the scrip in his own name.

The bill further proposes to make all such scrip receivable from actual settlers in payment of pre-emption claims, or in commutation of homestead claims, in the same manner as now authorized by law in case of military bounty-land warrants.

The third section provides for the issue of certificates of entry by the proper local land officer in the name of the parties making the location, and for the issue of patents by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if he shall be satisfied that such certificates have been fairly obtained. The right of these parties to enter certain quantities of the public land or to receive certificates of location for so much as had previously been disposed of by the Government rests upon the decrees of the courts, as above set forth. Where the right to lands is recognized by the courts, and the Government has, by its previous disposition of them, deprived the parties of the enjoyment of the particular lands claimed, these certificates entitle the claimants to similar quantities of the public lands, and, to render them available, their subdivision to conform them to the legal subdivisions of the public domain is authorized.

A bill similar to the one under consideration was considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House of Representatives at the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and a favorable report was made, the views expressed in which we have adopted as the basis of this report. The Commissioner of the General Land Office approved the purpose of that bill, and suggested certain amendments which have been embodied in the present measure, which has also received the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported from the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. It is very difficult to understand the scope of the bill simply from hearing the report read at the Clerk's desk. I should like to have the reasons for this bill stated by the Senator who reports it, the effect of the bill, the difference between the privileges which this bill will confer upon this scrip and that which it now possesses. As I understand it, this scrip now can be located upon any land open to private entry. The proposition is that the scrip may be taken in payment for all dues owed by pre-emption settlers or homestead settlers to the Treasury of the United States. Is that the point of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. That is the purport of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Now why is it necessary to give this enhanced value to the scrip? At the time of the original legislation, it was satisfactory to these parties. I believe that legislation was considered a boon to them, it allowing them to have scrip that could be located upon lands subject to private entry. Those are not ordinarily the lands which are open to pre-emption and homestead, but the lands which having been offered at public sale are not bought. They are not of such a valuable character that persons are willing to buy them at public sale; therefore they become open to private entry, and can be entered upon with scrip, &c., and are generally taken up for speculative purposes. It is now proposed to take scrip to which this measure of value was given by the original legislation, and to make it as available as cash in the hands of the pre-emption and homestead settlers to pay the Government its dues. It is no particular advantage to the settler because the scrip would immediately, on account of its enlarged use, rise in value until the pre-emptor probably would have to pay nearly as much as the cash would be which his land would cost. Why give this great speculative value to this scrip? That is the question that I want answered. Where is the justice or equity which requires the Government of the United States to have this scrip treated as cash to discharge obligations toward it? In other words, why in effect substitute in the hands of the holder of the scrip for the right to locate upon comparatively worthless lands a right really to pay the Government for the best lands?

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the right of the parties holding this scrip to have it has been the subject of adjudication. The bill does not seek to confer any new right except that which the Senator from California mentions. The right to land under the treaty of 1803 dates back to the time of that treaty. From time to time, controversies having arisen about the rights of parties under that treaty, Congress has provided by legislation for the settlement and determination of those rights, and by the passage of various acts enumerated in the report, commencing in 1806 and continuing from that time at intervals down to the present, Congress has provided methods of determining the rights of parties under that treaty. Many of these, in fact all of these, were rights to particular lands, lands within certain exterior boundaries, which we know the meaning of from our experience under similar treaties with Mexico in reference to lands in New Mexico and California. Pending the determination of these rights, however, by reason of defects in the proceedings instituted or rather authorized by Congress for that purpose, the lands to which these parties were entitled have been taken up; they have been frittered away, so to speak, from the alluvial lands which they might have had in the territory of Louisiana seventy-five years ago to accept now that which is of very much less value, call it what you please, under this bill.

The Senator from California objects because we are giving, by reason of this bill, a largely enhanced value to this scrip. I think that is not the case. In 1858 Congress passed an act reciting that:

Where any private land claim has been confirmed by Congress, and the same, in whole or in part, has not been located or satisfied, either for want of a specific location prior to such confirmation, or for any reason whatsoever, other than a discovery of fraud in such claim subsequent to such confirmation, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of the district in which such claim was situated, upon satisfactory proof that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, to issue to the claimant, or his legal representatives, a certificate of location for a quantity of land equal to that so confirmed and unsatisfied; which certificate may be located upon any of the public lands of the United States subject to sale at private entry at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre.

At the time that act was passed and at the date of the passage of the specific acts enumerated in the report, the lands which might have been taken under those provisions are a great deal more valuable than any lands which can be taken now.

The minimum value of the lands of the United States is $1.25 per acre. The maximum value this scrip could have in the hands of a settler seeking to enter land would be $1.25 per acre. It as a matter of course will be very much less when you put it on the market, because it undoubtedly will pass through different hands before it comes to the settler.

The Committee on Public Lands, in introducing the provision that it shall be used by actual settlers only, designed to prevent the location of this scrip in large bodies whereby practically speculation in the public lands might be carried on, and to limit its use to those persons who have already settled or who may hereafter settle on public lands, so that it would not result in the aggregation of large bodies of lands in the hands of one person or small combinations of persons. It simply authorizes it to be used in a manner similar to the use that is made of bounty land warrants; and the obligation of the Government to these parties is just as fixed and definite and determined as any other obligation the Government is under to any of its citizens or anybody else.

This matter has been before different committees of both Houses heretofore, has been reported favorably by a committee of the present House of Representatives—I think the report is now before the Senator from California—has been submitted repeatedly to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and Secretary of the Interior, each time receiving favorable reports accompanied by a recommendation that the bill should pass. There does not seem to be any reason why at this late day, seventy-five years after the time when these rights were confirmed by the treaty of 1803, these parties should not have some small measure of that justice which is their due.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this bill, I notice, covers a pretty broad ground, and it brings to my mind, as suggested by one or two gentlemen who are familiar with the history of the Senate, some pretty old affairs connected with some land grants that were strongly suspected afterward, like the Houmas grant, &c., to be frauds, but which were gotten through Congress by one contrivance or another. "The holders of such scrip," this bill provides, are to have rights in respect of its location which the existing law does not confer. The subject to which this bill refers I think should have been properly considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims, the records of which committee show the history of these various private land grants, and claims, and scrip, &c., and who are considering questions of this character continually. As the law has stood for some time in respect to some of these old acts, the provision was that where a private land claim was confirmed under the authority of an act of Congress, and it turned out that in consequence of some act of the Government the land could not be located on the spot where the original French or Spanish or Mexican grant placed it, the person entitled might locate an equal number of acres anywhere, sometimes within the State, and sometimes and generally within the United States, on lands subject to private entry at $1.25 an acre. That was the escape-valve for apparent injustice that it was sometimes thought might be done. In this state of the case, and considering the great importance of this bill and its wide scope touching these private land claims—for that is all there is of it—I suggest the propriety of referring it to the Committee on Private Land Claims to have their view on the subject in connection with the investigations and considerations that are constantly going on in that committee, and I make that motion.

Mr. McDONALD. I think it is very proper, indeed, that it should go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the bill be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that motion is put I should be glad to make a statement. This bill refers only to cases where, under decisions of the Supreme Court, all questions with reference to the rights of these parties have already been settled. That adjudication puts them in possession of this muniment of title, this certificate; but it does not give them any right to locate it upon anything which is valuable at all events.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Allow me to suggest that I think the bill goes a little further than that. I think it not only speaks of cases that have already been determined, but applies to those that may be hereafter determined.

Mr. PLUMB. But that can only be by the judgment of the Supreme Court under statutes already existing, so that it does not provide for any new adjudication. It only accepts the adjudication which has already either been made or provided for, and provides a method of adjusting or settling obligation which the United States has already acknowledged to exist and which has been or may hereafter be determined by its own courts.

I have no particular objection to this bill going to the Committee on Private Land Claims. There is not anything in it that, as I understand, will not stand the test of their scrutiny.

The Senator from Vermont has mentioned, I think, some cases which have arisen under the adjustments of land claims in the territory which we acquired from Mexico, and no doubt great abuses have arisen. For the purpose of meeting them and owing to some knowledge which I personally had in regard to those cases and in regard to similar cases in which errors or worse might arise which were now pending before the Senate, at an early period of the session I introduced a bill to provide for an adjudication of all those cases within the territory acquired from Mexico which had not before been adjudicated. While I do not care to reflect upon the industry or application of the Committee on Private Land Claims, I have yet to hear of any report having been made upon that bill.

More than that, there are pending before that committee, I think, or at all events there are before the Senate for the purpose of reference to that committee, if not already before it, a large number of cases which have been settled or adjudicated, as far as they can be adjudicated, by the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico. I think myself that the Committee on Private Land Claims has evidenced a proper degree of solicitude for the interests of the Government in not taking up and considering those reports from the surveyor-general; but I do insist that with reference to this class of cases it is far better for the Government that they should be settled upon some rule which shall be not only fair to the Government itself, but fair to the claimants, than it is that they shall remain until they become chronic and swell to a volume which will make it some day possible that they may all get together and go through without that scrutiny they ought to have.

If there can be any reasonable degree of assurance that this bill will receive present consideration at the hands of the Committee on Private Land Claims, certainly I shall have no objection whatever to its going there. But, Mr. President, this bill has been before different committees of both Houses of Congress; it has received not only the consideration of those committees, but their favorable action and report in both bodies, a report having been made on a similar bill to the House of Representatives within a few days, and it has received the consideration of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and of the Secretary of the Interior and has been favorably indorsed by them; and it would seem as though certainly everything which could tend to establish the merit of the bill, to bring its provisions properly before Congress, had been done, and that further delay was not necessary.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Have there been cases already adjudicated by the United States Supreme Court?

Mr. PLUMB. I am so informed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me that somebody must have found out by experiment after the adjudication of those cases and the issuance and reception of the scrip that it was not worth much in the market, and they want to bring it up; or it may be that they, finding it not worth much in the market, have sold it out to speculators and those speculators want to bring it up. In either case I do not believe it would be wholesome legislation. But I have not much confidence in these old land-grant cases, very little indeed, especially in those that are seventy-five years old before a remedy is applied. Why was it that these parties did not enter on this land seventy-five or fifty years ago?

Mr. PLUMB. I think I can answer that question.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator can answer it after I get through.

Mr. PLUMB. I can do it now. It appears by an examination of the statutes that Congress commenced to legislate on this subject in 1806; that it legislated in 1806 and in 1858, and at various periods from that time down to 1872, authorizing these parties to make application to the courts for the purpose of having their rights established.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Constantly reopening the subject.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Congress having by substantive legislation authorized a judicial determination of these rights, it certainly does not seem to me now that it is either wise or becoming that we should undertake to say that these parties shall not have the benefit of that which has been judicially determined to be theirs.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not the ancient legislation of Congress which it is now proposed to give these parties the benefit of, but that which took place eleven years ago, or some of it six or seven years ago, which is not found now so effective as the parties would like or the parties who have succeeded to their interests, and therefore it is necessary to come in and give a higher value to this scrip at this time.

I was saying, however, that I had very little confidence in these ancient land-grant cases. I have lived nearly thirty years in a State which has been very much cursed in this respect by fraudulent land grants, by forged land grants, some of them sifted out by the courts, some of them getting by the courts and being confirmed, where they took broad acres extending over such an immense amount of country that some of the men who owned Spanish grants there could not possibly go around their circumference with a swift horse in a day of twenty-four hours. I have no doubt that some, and perhaps many, of the pretended Mexican grants in California were honest and bona fide, improvidently made, too generously made perhaps by the Mexican government; but they were bona fide in the sense that they complied with Mexican laws, and were made prior to the annexation of California to the United States, consequently while the jurisdiction existed in the hands of the Mexican officers, and that there was a bona fide grantee. But there is a very large class of them also where they were made subsequent to the annexation of California to the United States, or where having been made prior a grant of half a league or a league has been extended to a dozen, perhaps twenty leagues. In other words, frauds of every possible name have been committed in that State under perhaps as good a system for sifting them out as could be devised. Originally a land commission was provided before whom all holders of land grants were required to file their papers, and that within a year after the admission of the State into the Union, then an appeal to the United States district court, and then an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, perhaps the best system which could be devised in order to sift out the fraudulent from the true. And yet I doubt if there is any intelligent Californian who does not believe at the present day that vast frauds have been committed by the forgery of claims since the jurisdiction of Mexico ceased, and that these have passed through the courts and have been confirmed. There is now pending in the United States Supreme Court a case wherein on behalf of the United States it was alleged in the court below, the case not having proceeded further, that the grant was forged after California became the property of the United States, was forged within the boundaries of the State, was signed there by a man who formerly had been governor under Mexico, and if made during the term of his governorship he would unquestionably have had a right to execute it, but several years after California became a State of the Union he, conspiring with others, forged a grant to one of the most valuable tracts in the State, and in one of the most populous counties. When the application was made on behalf of the United States in the United States court below to open the case in order to determine whether or not these allegations were true, and whether that grant was a forgery made after the State of California was admitted into the Union, the court below held, for reasons unquestionably satisfactory to them, that the United States had no rights in the matter, and that the fraud was a success. That question is on appeal here.

I do not mention this for the purpose of prejudicing the case at all, although I have opinions upon it, but simply to show the class of frauds which grow up under Mexican grants, grants like those in Florida, in Missouri, in Louisiana, in California, and in New Mexico, as illustrating that Congress under a pretended regard for hoary claims may be entrapped as courts are entrapped into recognizing enormous land steals. I look with suspicion upon a bill which proceeds upon the premise that seventy-five years ago there was a grant in Louisiana which the parties did not avail themselves of and for which in order to avail themselves of there were statutes passed from time to time down to half a dozen years ago, and now we come in to add to all those statutes a provision that the land scrip which we gave at that time to these parties in settlement shall be taken and made at the expense of the Treasury of the United States equivalent to cash.

I say, then, unless this matter was examined by a committee of lawyers of this body, tracing the original history of these grants and the course of legislation down to the present time, and saying that we are bound in conscience, upon their authority as lawyers, to pass a bill like this, I am opposed to its passage and will use every means I can in order to defeat it. For that reason I am in favor of the reference of this bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims, on which are some of the ablest Senators in this body, and if they shall come in and say that, considering the origin of these claims and the history of legislation down to the present time, it is just and necessary that this bill pass, then I will yield my convictions. Otherwise I must say that my experience in these matters leads me so strongly to distrust them that I shall oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I hope that this bill will not be committed to the Committee on Private Land Claims, for the reason that such a reference virtually defeats the passage of the bill at this session. If this bill be just, if we propose to do an act of justice to the people who hold this scrip, there is no reason why this bill should not be passed. It has no connection whatever with any fraudulent Mexican land claim, nor has it any connection with any fraudulent Houmas claim in the State of Louisiana. My constituents hold to-day a very considerable amount of this land scrip, and I do not conceal or desire to conceal from the Senate that the object of this bill is to enhance the value of that scrip. There was a litigation which lasted for forty years arising out of the validity of French concessions. After this protracted and expensive litigation, carried on by these parties at their own cost, they had a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States in their favor that the lands which they claimed belonged legally to their ancestors. When they claimed to be put in possession of these lands which were adjudicated to them by the Supreme Court of the United States it was discovered that the Government of the United States itself had already disposed of these lands and had received the proceeds of the lands which belonged to these litigants and put them into the United States Treasury.

The very decree of the Supreme Court which adjudicated these lands under French concessions to these parties in Louisiana provided that land scrip should be issued to them which could be used for private-land entry. Of course the effect of the decision was that all the time from the very date the concession was made these parties owned these lands, but when they received this scrip, which was limited to private-land entries, instead of having lands which they owned, instead of having land scrip which had any value, they were put in possession of that land scrip which is not worth twenty cents on the dollar, because there is nothing but refuse land in the State of Louisiana by which they can make this scrip available. And the only purpose of this bill, so far as the parties interested in Louisiana are concerned—I know nothing with reference to the other States—is to simply give a marketable value to the scrip which they hold, and to allow actual settlers to pay the Government in this scrip.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to ask him for what purposes this scrip can be used under the sixth section of the act of Congress of June 22, 1860? This act is referred to in the bill; but what its terms or provisions are do not appear, and I cannot find the act very conveniently, as it is only referred to by the date of its approval.

Mr. EUSTIS. It was under that act of 1860 that this litigation was finally brought to a close; and the sixth section of that act provided that the scrip issued to the claimants "may be located upon lands subject to private entry at $1.25 an acre."

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then is there any limit to the locality within which the lands subject to entry with this scrip are located, or can it be located upon any of the public lands of the United States?

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the Senator mean under the act of 1860?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EUSTIS. I take it for granted it is limited to the State where the concessions were made; otherwise they would not require the passage of this act. Of course if the parties who hold this scrip could go and enter lands outside of the State, the scrip would have its full value.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The section of the law to which my attention is directed by the Senator from Kansas, who has charge of this bill, is as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall appear that lands claimed, and the title to which may be confirmed under the provisions of this act, have been sold in whole or in part by the United States prior to such confirmation, or where the surveyor-general of the district shall ascertain that the same cannot be surveyed and located, the party in whose favor the title is confirmed shall have the right to enter upon any of the public lands of the United States a quantity of land equal in extent to that sold by the Government: Provided, That said entry be made only on lands subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre, and as far as may be possible in legal divisions and subdivisions, according to the surveys made by the United States.

I do not perceive upon the first reading of that section that it is limited to the State within which the original grant was located.

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If that be so, the effect of this provision is to make this scrip locatable upon any public lands of the United States subject to private entry, and the second section of it would extend to homesteads and pre-emptions upon any lands of the United States, whether within railroad land-grants or otherwise; and the effect of the bill would seem to be to enhance very largely the value of this scrip beyond the value attached to it under the original act.

Mr. EUSTIS. I merely wish to state now, Mr. President, that this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands, as I am informed, and the measure has also been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I am opposed in principle to issuing and throwing upon the market any more scrip, for any purpose, which may be located upon the public lands of the United States. We have an abundance of that article now, and the evils flowing from its existence, from the uses to which it can be applied, and the abuses which have sprung up from the issuance of this scrip are so great that, so far as I am concerned, if any remuneration is to be given in any way to these claimants of land, I should prefer myself to pay them in cash rather than to issue further certificates or to extend the privileges or incidents of the scrip already issued. The effect of this bill is, it seems to me, to enhance very largely the value of the scrip. If the act of June 22, 1860, has been modified, and if the scrip cannot be used for entering any of the lands subject to private entry, then this bill upon its face changes any subsequent restriction and removes it; and the second section clearly permits its use for very important purposes which would add very greatly to the value of the scrip.

Mr. PLUMB. I agree so entirely with what the Senator from Minnesota has said about the policy of permitting speculation upon the public lands that I want simply to say that he misunderstands the purport of this bill if he thinks it will have that effect. It does not have that effect, but simply discharges an obligation of the Government by issuing scrip to be used by the owners, so that no possible speculation can result from it in the manner which he seemed to anticipate.

Mr. President, there is one other thing about this scrip. After this long litigation, of course there is no use in considering the question whether the decisions have been proper or not. I presume they have been or the courts would not have rendered them. I know nothing whatever about the antecedent steps, and I do not happen to know a person who directly or indirectly is interested in this scrip except as I know it from the public statement of the Senator from Louisiana, recently made. This scrip, as I understand, is now held in bulk. If a man has a grant under an orignal concession, it is for a certain number of acres that he holds in one piece, practically speaking. He can only locate it in that way. There is no provision whereby it can be subdivided, whereby he can locate it on forty, or eighty, or one hundred and sixty acre tracts at all. The condition of affairs as they now stand amounts to a practical embargo upon justice.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I believe the question pending before the Senate is on the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. OGLESBY. I was not present in the Committee on Public Lands when this bill was discussed before it; I was absent at my home; but I remember that the subject in a general sense had been considered by the members of that committee. It seems that the committee considered the bill and thought it proper to report it back and recommend its passage. I do not know, of course, what arguments controlled them exactly, but from my experience on that committee I doubt not they were controlled by the strongest arguments and the clearest case, or the bill would not have found its way back here with their recommendation. Now, what is to be gained by referring this bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims? What does the Senate expect to obtain by that motion? Would the Senate expect the Committee on Private Land Claims to go back and consider the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as to whether this land scrip had been properly authorized or not? Would the Committee on Private Land Claims go back and search through the history of each tract of land or each piece of scrip beyond the Supreme Court, or does the Senate wish to intimate, by sending it to the Committee on Private Land Claims, that it will not be satisfied with any decision the Supreme Court may hereafter make on another new case?

What has the Committee on Private Land Claims to do with the thing? What new light can they shed upon the subject? The Senator from California with considerable force and earnestness made allusion to a large class of fraudulent land claims that had been palmed off on the people of the United States in California since the acquisition of California from the government of Mexico. What the Senator from California says may be entirely true, and in a general sense I think not unlikely it is true; but does that throw any light on the subject of the settlement of a man's right to a piece of land in Louisiana, or Florida, or Missouri under the purchase of that Territory from Spain and France? What light, I should like to know, does our experience in regard to Mexican land grants or Spanish land grants through the Mexican Republic in California shed upon an entirely different and remote subject? Whether the people who hold this scrip hold it justly or not or those who may hereafter get any shall hold it justly and fairly and legally or not, depends by the very words of this bill upon the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. Cannot the Senate stand upon the findings and judgments of that tribunal, or does it prefer to stand upon the judgment and finding of the Committee on Private Land Claims of the Senate? If that be not the object, what is it?

Do you suppose the Committee on Private Land Claims are going to throw any more light on this subject than the Committee on Public Lands has attempted to throw on it, on this point as to whether this scrip shall be located in a volume of five hundred or five thousand acres or ten thousand acres in a block, as it would now be located under existing laws, or as the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate think, to locate it in subdivisions of one hundred and sixty acres. Does the State of California or the State of Kansas, or the State of Nebraska, or either one of the Southern States where there are public lands left to be disposed of, want locations of land made by scrip in blocks of sections and townships? I imagine not. This bill is very careful to say that it shall be subdivided into sections, quarter sections, and forty-acre tracts, into the legal subdivisions provided by law, and that being so divided up the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue to the holder of this scrip in block, if he chooses to take smaller subdivisions described in lieu of that, so that it may be planted about in different spots on the public surveyed lands, not the unsurveyed, but the surveyed lands of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and I do not like to differ with him on the construction of the language of his bill, but that is not the proposition at all; the proposition is that it shall be turned into money.

Mr. OGLESBY. It is not my bill. When I come to that I will discuss it. I am only discussing one point at a time. I cannot do what the Senator from California can always do, discuss two points at once. One at a time is all I can get along with.

Mr. SARGENT. That is as much as any one man can get along with, but the Senator will hardly lay down one proposition and then go on and state an entirely different one.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not stand corrected by the Senator from California. This bill provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue scrip, and gives the right to the person to make an entry with that scrip on lands subject to entry at $1.25 an acre, does it not?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir.

Mr. OGLESBY. Then I do not read it aright. Under this bill also the holder of the scrip may assign it to any purchaser, and that purchaser may take the scrip and locate the land. An actual occupier of the land may take that scrip, settle upon land, and get a title under the scrip as an actual settler on one hundred and sixty acres of land. If it is not so provided in the bill, I have read it wrong and ought to be corrected; but I have only read it since I have been sitting here, for I was not in the committee when it was considered; and as I have read it hastily, it may be possible that in some respects I have not got a correct understanding of it. It is simply to divide this scrip up. Whether the people who hold it got it honestly or dishonestly, I do not know. I will go as far as any Senator on this floor to stop the issuing of scrip to be located upon the public lands from any questionable source or for any questionable purpose. What the Government wants her public lands for in the future is actual settlement. This Government has repeated over and over, again and again, that the policy for the disposition of the public lands should be to give them to the actual occupant of the soil. We desire to carry that policy out in the States, old and new, and in Territories. This bill provides that only the actual settler can utilize this scrip when he gets it in paying for a pre-emption made by him, or in paying for a homestead settlement where he abandons, under the homestead law, his title and chooses to purchase the homestead tract, instead of living out the five years required by law.

Can the Committee on Private Land Claims throw any more light on this subject than the Senate can, or than the Committee on Public Lands can? If the Senate shall believe that, then they will send the bill to that committee; but it is the only reason in the world for sending it there, unless you expect that committee to go back behind the Supreme Court of the United States and say whether it has properly adjudicated these cases. I do not see anything in the bill that is objectionable. I do not see anything in it that the Senate cannot sustain.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 2, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order would be the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he understands that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] does not propose to antagonize the morning hour of to-day by moving to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the executive and legislative appropriation bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. REAGAN. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read two extracts from the Commercial Gazette, of Pittsburgh, I believe; one dated April 27, 1878, and the other April 29, 1878.

The Clerk read as follows:

We have for a long time suspected the good faith of REAGAN, in the matter of the freight-discrimination bill. He has been abundant in excuses and trifling in action. His latest excuse was that he could not get the bill up out of order and must wait the regular time. When the regular order did come, on Thursday, he failed to report. It is scarcely possible for him to excuse this failure. It proves that he is a traitor to the bill and does not propose to have it brought up this session. In view of the known monetary influences opposed to the bill his action places him in a very suspicious light. In any event he represents the democratic party and has taken the most effective measure to kill the bill. Had it come up, there were enough votes assured to pass it; but having withheld it, at the call just made, it is almost impossible to have it passed at all. Should Congress adjourn in June, which is not improbable, that bill cannot by any possibility pass. It should be distinctly understood that the democratic party will be held responsible for this breach of faith, and must suffer the consequences.—Commercial Gazette, April 27, 1878.

It begins to be very strongly hinted that if GLOVER would fish a little in the Committee on Commerce he might get a bite from REAGAN. The operations of that gentleman in the freight-discrimination matter are of a character to command very general interest, not to say suspicion. When, a year or two ago, another gentleman handled this matter in that committee it is said he improved in circumstances very materially. REAGAN was exceedingly anxious to get the chairmanship this session, and was particularly anxious to get the freight-discrimination bill before his committee. There are several corporations that can afford to "see" the chairman, and despite his early zeal for the bill it has been noticed that there was a day when Mr. REAGAN suddenly cooled, and began to talk of the difficulties of getting his bill before the House. One day last week his committee was called, and the opportunity was squarely before him of reporting the anti-discrimination bill. REAGAN was absent. Of course he dodged. Thus he has the rare honor of having shown the clover foot. Do the democrats propose to be responsible for this man? He has done badly, and tainted himself and party, and perpetrated a great public wrong. The bill should at least have a chance for its life. What has Mr. REAGAN to say?—Commercial Gazette, April 29, 1878.

Mr. REAGAN. During the seven years that first and last I have been a member of this House this is the first time I have ever felt called upon to notice anything said about me or my acts in the newspapers. And I would not do so now but that the articles just read by the Clerk refer to the manner in which I have discharged my duties both as a member of the Committee on Commerce and a member of this House in relation to a measure which I regard as one of the most important now pending before Congress. I refer to the bill relating to the regulation of interstate commerce and to prevent unjust discrimination by common carriers.

During the Forty-fourth Congress Mr. Hopkins, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill the same in substance as the one which the Committee on Commerce of this House have reported. That bill led to a pretty extensive investigation by the Committee on Commerce. That committee took the sworn testimony of railroad officials and others in relation to the necessity for the enactment of such a law. I felt then the necessity of the passage of such a law and earnestly co-operated with Mr. Hopkins in trying to secure action upon the bill. But it had been introduced rather late in the session and we were unable to act upon it during the last Congress.

At the beginning of the extra session of the present Congress, Mr. Hopkins not being a member of this House, I reintroduced the bill which he introduced during the last Congress, and had it referred to the Committee on Commerce. I desire to make a very brief statement about my action in connection with that bill.

I asked the committee to give prompt attention to the bill, because I regarded it as one of very great importance. When I say that it relates to the cost of transportation of the $18,000,000,000 of internal commerce which, according to the Bureau of Statistics passes over the railroads of the country annually, and provides for placing limitations upon the power of those great corporations to do injustice both to individuals and communities by discriminations in rates of freight, the magnitude and importance of the bill will be evident to all. The committee concurred with me in my view that the bill was of importance, and at an early period in this session authorized me to report it to the House.

Under the instructions of the committee, as the best means of securing early and favorable action on the bill, I asked that it be printed and recommitted to the committee in order that I might be able to bring it up for action when our committee was next called. As soon as the bill was reported I made it my business to go to members on both sides of the House to invite their attention to the bill and to the long, printed report that accompanied it, and to ask them to consider it and, if it recommended itself to their judgment, to aid in the passage of the bill. Since then, from time to time, when I hoped that we might have a morning hour in which to report it, I have repeatedly gone to gentlemen on both sides of the House and recalled their attention to the bill and report and asked their co-operation to secure the passage of the bill.

Last week, I believe, the Committee on Commerce was called, and we had some twenty minutes of a morning hour. I did not then report the bill, for the reason that the committee had some ten or fifteen bills prepared and ready to report, and under instructions of the committee and by agreement of the committee I consented that the other bills of less importance before us might be reported during the morning hour, and either action secured upon them at that time or some day set for their consideration upon the Calendar, in order that when we reached the bill relating to internal commerce and the preventing of discrimination by common carriers we might be in a position to insist either upon having a day fixed for its consideration or upon having it considered during the morning hour, and thus not fail to secure action of the House upon the bill.

These facts that I state are known to every member of the Committee on Commerce and to many members of the House on both sides to whom I have applied for aid in securing the passage of the bill. They may be further proved by the persistence which I have steadily for three weeks past insisted on having a morning hour, mainly for the purpose of reaching and securing action upon this important bill.

It is said in the articles which have been read by the Clerk that I was absent when the committee was called; that when I could have reported the bill I was not here and did not report it. I state now that I have never been out of my place upon this floor one moment at any time when I could by any possibility have reported this bill and secured action upon it. That is enough for me to say in reference to the charge that I was absent and dodged in order to avoid reporting this bill.

It is stated in the article which has been read that I have been guilty of duplicity, of treachery, of venality; that I have been approached by railroad corporations who have large means and were able to "see" me in reference to this bill; that thus I have suddenly cooled off in my support of the bill. These grave charges are all made in the teeth of the fact that my whole action before the committee and before this House shows the truth of what I say—that I have earnestly exerted myself at all times in the committee and in the House to secure the passage of the bill.

Before this House and the people in any part of this country who know me, I would not feel called upon to notice these charges. I do not think that any man on earth who has known me, multitudinous as my faults may be, has ever conceived that I acted with duplicity, or treachery, or venality upon any subject in the course of my whole life.

It is further stated in the article that the democratic party through me is to be held responsible for the treacherous defeat of this bill. Why, sir, in the committee no one ever thought of making this a partisan question. Not only six at least of the seven democrats on the committee support the bill, but the four republican members of the committee also support it. If the report is not unanimous, it certainly is the report of ten members of the committee out of eleven. So far as my observation in this House has gone I have seen no disposition on the part of any one to regard or treat this as a partisan question. It relates to a matter affecting in a large degree the material interests of the whole country, without reference to party or to section. While we are struggling here to save to the country a few million dollars by economizing expenditures, I say to you, sir, that in my judgment this bill, if passed, would save to the country in the cost of transportation more than all the annual expenditures of this Government. Such are my convictions in reference to the importance of this measure and such have been the reasons why I have earnestly tried to urge it forward to its passage.

I have only to add that the two articles of that paper do not contain a single statement which is not utterly false and without the shadow of foundation. This is not the time or the presence in which to characterize such language; and I shall not do so further than to say that I suppose every one cognizant of my action will feel, as I do, nothing but pity and scorn for a wretch so lost to a sense of honor and justice as to be willing to inflict such injury upon the reputation of a fellow-man among people who do not know him.

Mr. DUNNELL. As a member of the Committee on Commerce I ask the privilege of saying one word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have never heard read from the Clerk's desk a more ungenerous, unkind, and untruthful statement than that which has been read this morning in relation to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. If any gentleman could display zeal and an unflagging interest in any measure, these qualities have been displayed by the gentleman from Texas in reference to this bill. He not only introduced the bill referred to by this correspondent, but he has followed it up week after week and month after month until it was ready to be reported. I am witness to the fact that for the last three weeks he has been as constant as the most devoted friend to any measure could be in endeavoring to have a call of the committees that he might report and bring up for consideration this identical bill. I say, therefore, there is not a sentence in that article which is not absolutely and wholly false.

GOVERNMENT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENDEE, by unanimous consent, reported back, with amendments, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the public Calendar, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

CUSTOMS-REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past eleven o'clock. The first business in order is the unfinished business pending at the close of the last morning hour, the bill (H. R. No. 3828) to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moities."

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose this subject has been sufficiently discussed, and unless the House desires its further consideration I demand the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL. What has become of the legislative appropriation bill? I am desirous to see the real business of Congress proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The business of the morning hour is proceeding and nothing which does not relate to that business is in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that I shall endeavor to call up the legislative appropriation bill immediately upon the expiration of the morning hour.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. EDEN. I suggest that the gentleman reporting this bill should make some explanation of it. I confess I do not understand it.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have already explained this matter somewhat fully a few days ago. I do not object, however, to entering now into a brief explanation. This bill is intended to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moities."

The effect of the proposed amendment will be to place the naval officers at Baltimore and New Orleans on a like footing as to salaries with the naval officers at Boston, Charlestown, San Francisco, and Philadelphia. It will have the further effect that it will place the surveyor of the ports of New Orleans, Baltimore, and Portland on the same grade as to salary with the surveyors of the ports of Boston, San Francisco, and Philadelphia. In the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is coincided in by the Committee on Commerce, it is a mere casus omissus and should have been incorporated in the original act.

The bill now under consideration will correct the omission and place Baltimore, New Orleans, and Portland in the grade to which they properly belong. The law as it now stands makes an unjust discrimination, and nothing more than substantial justice would be accomplished by the passage of the bill as reported by the committee. If any one desires it I will ask for the reading of the letter of the Commissioner.

Mr. HALE. Is not this bill the same bill that was discussed the other day?

Mr. ROBERTS. It is.

Mr. HALE. And after explanation of which all further opposition was withdrawn?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CASWELL. Is there any minority report?

Mr. ROBERTS. There is none. The report is unanimous. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The later motion was agreed to.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3988) to organize the life-saving service, and to move its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to ask that it be made the special order for the 9th of this month, and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The bill and report have already been ordered to be printed?

Mr. ROBERTS. They have.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course it is the understanding it is not to interfere with prior orders?

The SPEAKER. It cannot interfere with prior orders.

Mr. BLOUNT. Nor with appropriation bills.

Mr. ROBERTS. Of course I do not intend it shall interfere with regular appropriation bills. I propose it shall be made the special order for the 9th of May after the morning hour, and from day to day till disposed of; not to interfere with appropriation bills or prior orders.

Mr. WOOD. Will it interfere with the tariff bill?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. O'NEILL. It will not be much harm if it does.

The motion of Mr. ROBERTS was agreed to.

AID TO WRECKED VESSELS.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 1786, a bill (H. R. No. 4674) to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters conterminous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that Canadian vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to Canadian or other vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters of the United States contiguous to the Dominion of Canada; provided that the act shall not take effect until a proclamation by the President declaring that the privilege of aiding American or other vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States has been extended by the government of the Dominion of Canada, and declaring the act to be in force; and provided further that the act shall not be in force from and after the date of proclamation by the President to the effect that said reciprocal privilege has been withdrawn or revoked by the said government of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. DUNNELL. The simple object of this bill, which was in charge of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] member of the Committee on Commerce, is to provide for reciprocity between the wrecking-vessels of the United States and the wrecking-vessels of Canada, so as to allow American vessels to go to the Canadian shore to rescue or aid American sailors, and also that Canadian wrecking-vessels may come to the American shore for a like purpose. It is well guarded and is indorsed and recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. WOOD. Is there any report accompanying this?

Mr. DUNNELL. There is none. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT SILVER WAVE.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3546) to change the name of the steamboat D. A. McDonald to Silver Wave.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the owner of the steamboat D. A. McDonald, a vessel of American ownership, running on the Upper Mississippi River, to change the name of said boat to that of Silver Wave.

It appears from the report, which was read, that it is a passenger stern-wheel steamer, built in 1872 at Le Claire, Iowa, as follows: Material, wood; length, one hundred and twenty feet; depth, four feet; breadth, twenty-four feet; tonnage, one hundred and sixty-eight and thirty-eight hundredths; capacity, forty passengers. It has two good engines and is in all respects a first-class steamer.

Mr. DUNNELL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARATARIA SHIP-CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3978) to authorize the Barataria Ship-Canal Company to construct and operate a ship-canal from New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico, through the lands and waters of the United States, and to grant to said company the right of way for that purpose.

The bill was read. It grants to the Barataria Ship-Canal Company, a body-corporate of the State of Louisiana, created by an act of the Legislature of said State, approved April 24, 1877, the right of way through the lands and waters of the United States, to enable said company to construct and operate a ship-canal from a point at or near the city of New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico, through the Barataria Bay, in the State of Louisiana, with power and authority to construct and maintain all necessary harbors, locks, dams, dikes, levees, and piers; provided the same shall in no manner interfere with or affect the usual and ordinary navigation of said waters where they are not confined either by piers or canal-banks constructed by said company, and necessary for the use and operation of said canal; and provided further that Bayou Villars shall not be closed by said canal company.

In its second section it provides that, in the transportation of military or naval stores, troops, or munitions of war of the United States, such rates of toll only shall be charged as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and that the tolls or tonnage charges of said company shall not exceed $1 per ton on the tonnage measurement of any vessel for the round trip through said canal, or half said sum for less than the round trip, and not exceeding twenty-five cents for each passenger through said canal either way; provided that vessels of five tons burden and less shall be exempt from tolls for the use of said canal when they do not pass through the locks.

Mr. REAGAN. An act was passed by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana incorporating a company for the purpose described in this bill. A bill was presented to the House and referred to the Committee on Commerce, for which this is a substitute, proposing a sort of reincorporation. The committee, instead of reporting the bill referred to them, report this bill which simply gives the right of way to the company over the lands and waters described in the bill from a point near New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico through the Barataria Bay. It contains no provision by which anything is secured from the Government but simply the right of way. And connected with that we have in the bill provided that the public waters through which the canal shall pass shall remain public and free to all navigation and that vessels of five tons burden and less shall pay no tolls.

We thought it right in granting the right of way to impose two limitations: first, in the transportation of Government supplies the rates of toll shall be regulated by the Secretary of War; and, secondly, the tolls of the company shall not exceed a certain maximum for freight and passengers. The Louisiana Legislature subsequently passed a joint resolution recommending and asking Congress to pass such a bill. This is all there is in it. There is nothing granted in land, money, or privileges, but simply the right of way; and then the freedom of all the public waters is preserved. As the bill contains nothing else and is the unanimous report of the committee, I will ask for the previous question on its passage.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot consent to open the bill for amendment. If the House desires to reject it I am willing they shall do so. But I do not desire that time shall be occupied in the discussion of this bill as there is another of considerable importance which I wish to report to-day.

Mr. CONGER. Will not the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. I must decline to do so. As I have said the bill grants nothing but the right of way.

Mr. CONGER. Then I make the point of order, which will send it to the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman can take his choice.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know to what point of order the bill is subject.

Mr. CONGER. The point of order is that it gives lands of the United States to this canal company.

Mr. REAGAN. I will hear the amendment read.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to allow it to be offered. I can get the bill where I can offer the amendment without consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot say whether I will yield for the amendment until I hear it read. If I can be permitted to do so, and if this will prevent me getting in a bill of more importance, which I am prepared to report, I will withdraw the bill. But I will hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

At the end of section 2 add as follows:

And provided further, That no toll shall be charged on any boats or vessels navigating any of the waters on the line of said canal which could have been navigated by such vessels had such canal not been built.

Mr. REAGAN. I think if the gentleman from Michigan will read the bill he will see we have preserved all the public waters free. I will explain. There may be in the bayous of the pass some places where there is navigable water, but in other places it is necessary to cut through the marshes in order to connect the bayous and sloughs, and the object is to get thirty feet of water.

Mr. CONGER. I object very much to the small class of vessels that can navigate these waters without any canal whatever being compelled to pay toll because the waters are being deepened for the larger class of vessels.

Mr. REAGAN. We have made the canal free for vessels of five tons and under. That is intended to cover the fishing-smacks and all that class of boats.

Mr. CONGER. I think there can be no objection to this amendment if the gentleman means what he seems to mean by the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. We have preserved all the rights of navigation over the public waters. That is provided for specifically in the bill. The object of this company is to make a deep channel, and in passing through the marshes where there is no slough or channel there are occasional places where the streams may now be navigable but for a very shallow depth.

Mr. CONGER. This amendment only provides that vessels which could have passed through these waters without a channel shall not pay toll?

Mr. REAGAN. Very well; let the amendment be adopted.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask attention to this bill as one of very great importance; and I request members to listen while it is being read, for the reason that I shall propose to have it considered now. I do so because there are so many special orders already set that, if this bill is postponed till these special orders have been disposed of, I anticipate that action upon it at this session would be defeated. I regard it as a bill of so much importance that I ask action upon it now, and I hope gentlemen will give their attention while it is being read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, in or about operating, running, or using any railroad or railway, or the carriage of any property on or by means of any railroad or railway or other means of transportation by common carriers, directly or indirectly to charge to, or receive from, any corporation, company, person, or party, any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward for the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any property carried, or to be carried, on or by any such railroad or railway, or other means of transportation by common carriers, and which is, or is to be, wholly or partly carried on or by such railroad or railway, or other means of transportation by common carriers, in, or as part of, one actually or substantially continuous carriage, from or to any foreign nation or country, into or from within any State or States, Territory or Territories, of the United States, or in or through two or more States or Territories of the United States, or from within one State or Territory of the United States into or through one or more other State or States, Territory or Territories, of the United States, than shall be received and retained from any other corporation, company, person, or party, for the same or substantially the same or similar act, service, or thing, acts, services, or things, respectively, done or performed, or which is or are to be, or should have been, done or performed, respectively, at the same or substantially the same time or times, or while the same schedule relating thereto, hereinafter provided for, shall be in force. Every corporation, company, receiver, trustee, and person acting or engaged as aforesaid shall afford and furnish the same and equally good, cheap, and expeditious advantages, services, means, and facilities for the carriage of all property entitled to be carried, and shall equally and as cheaply and expeditiously do and perform each and all acts, services, and things in, about, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or the carriage of all property which is, or is to be, or shall have been, carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage, as aforesaid; and for, in, about, or connected with through rates of freight, compensation, or reward, and for, in, about, or connected with any carrying connection, or any receipt, delivery, wharfage, or storage, and in all other respects, as is, are, or shall be afforded or furnished or done for, in, about, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage, respectively, of any other property of the same or substantially the same or similar kind, when said acts, services, and things, respectively, are furnished, done, or performed, or are to be, or should be, or should have been furnished, done, or performed, respectively, at the same or substantially the same time or times, or when the same schedule aforesaid in respect thereto is in force. No break, stoppage, or interruption in carriage, or any contract, arrangement, or understanding, or any act or acts, thing or things, shall prevent the carriage of any property from being, or being regarded as, actually and substantially one continuous carriage as aforesaid, unless such break, stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding, act or acts, thing or things, is or are, or was or were, for some practical purpose, and without intent to prevent such carriage from being, or being regarded as, actually or substantially continuous as aforesaid, and without intent to evade any provision of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to allow, return, deliver, do, cause, furnish, or pay, or cause, or suffer, or permit to be allowed, returned, delivered, done, caused, furnished, or paid, any rebate, drawback, commission, sum, act, service, or thing, which shall actually or substantially make, result in, or tend to make the freight, compensation, or reward received from or paid by any corporation, company, person, or party, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, less or more than the freight charge, compensation, or reward, respectively, received or paid and retained, for the same or substantially the same or similar carriage, act, or acts, thing or things, respectively, done or performed, or to be done or performed, for any other corporation, company, person, or party, in, about, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any other property of the same or substantially the same or similar kind, and done or performed, or which is or are to be, or which should be or have been done or performed at the same or substantially the same time or times, or when the same schedule aforesaid relating thereto shall be in force.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, directly or indirectly to make, enter into, or do, or cause, or suffer, or permit to be made, entered into, or done, any combination, connection, contract, understanding, arrangement, change of schedule, carriage in different cars, or in less than a car-load when carried by railroad, or less than a ton when carried otherwise, delay in carriage, or other delay, or other act, service, matter or thing, to or with intent to evade any provision of this act, or to or with intent to prevent any carriage aforesaid from being or being regarded as actually or substantially continuous as aforesaid, or whereby any corporation, company, person, or party, who may pay or agree to pay any sum, rate, or amount for or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, shall not have the same advantages and services, and as good, cheap, and expeditious means and facilities therefor, respectively, as is or are, or is or are to be, afforded or given to any other corporation, company, person, or party, for, in, about, or as to the same or substantially the same or similar carriage, act or acts, thing or things, service or services, respectively, done or performed, or which is or are to be, or should be, or should have been done or performed at the same or substantially the same time or times, or when the same schedule aforesaid relating thereto shall be in force.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, directly or indirectly to charge or receive any greater freight, rate of freight, compensation, or reward for the carriage of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, for a shorter than for a longer distance, or for the carriage of any of the same per mile, than shall be charged per mile, and received and retained, for the carriage of property of the same or substantially same or similar kind, the carriage of which is or is to be entirely performed within one State or Territory, and which is, is to be or should have been carried at the same time or substantially the same time or times; and the charges, compensation, and reward for the receiving; delivering, loading, unloading, handling, and storing of any property so carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid shall be no greater than the charges, compensation, or reward received and retained, respectively, for the same or substantially the same or similar act or acts, service or services, done or performed, or which is or are to be or should have been done or performed at the same or substantially the same time or times for or as to property of the same or substantially the same or similar kind, the carriage of which is, or is to be, completed within one State or Territory.

SEC. 5. That each and all the provisions of this act shall apply and relate to property, and the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, and carriage of the same, carried or to be carried, actually or substantially in or by one continuous carriage as aforesaid, and the freight, rate of freight, compensation, and reward, respectively, therefor, or connected with the same respectively, and each and all facilities, means, services, advantages, combinations, contracts, arrangements, understandings, acts, matters, and things for, or connected with the same, or any of the same, whether such property is or is to be carried wholly on or by one railroad or railway, or partly on or by one railroad or railway and partly on or by some other way or ways of carriage, and whether the acts, things, and services respectively as to the same is or are, or is or are to be, done or performed, or such freight, reward, or compensation is, or is to be, charged or received or retained by any such corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, alone or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, or alone, as one freight, compensation, or reward, or with, or as part of, any other freight or freights, compensation or compensations, reward or rewards, sum or sums, amount or amounts.

SEC. 6. That every corporation, company, receiver, trustee, and person acting or engaged as aforesaid shall, from and after thirty days after the passage of this act, adopt and keep posted copies of a schedule in force at the time, as to all property, whether carried or to be carried entirely within one State or Territory, or otherwise, as aforesaid, with reference to the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of or as to which any of them, respectively, is or are to act or be engaged as aforesaid, and which schedule shall plainly, distinctly, and separately state:

First, the different kinds and classes of all property to be carried;

Second, the different places and termini between and at which each kind and class of such property will be carried, received, and delivered; and

Third, the rates of freight and prices for the carriage from place to place, and between the different places aforesaid, and for the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, and storing of each kind and class of said property, and the rates of freight and prices aforesaid, separately, when separate rate or charge, rates or charges, are to be made for any of the matters aforesaid.

Such schedule may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedule shall be printed in plain large type, at least of the size of ordinary Pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection, in at least two places in every depot or place where freight is usually received or discharged, to which such schedule shall relate; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular, except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substituted schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted, as is above provided, at least ten days before the time when it shall go into effect, and which substituted schedule shall thereupon at the end of said time go into effect, and remain in effect until another schedule shall as aforesaid, and in the manner aforesaid, be substituted therefor. It shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, directly or indirectly to charge or receive or retain more or less freight, rate of freight, compensation, or reward for the carriage, receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any property aforesaid, carried, or to be carried, in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, than shall be specified therefor in the schedule aforesaid, which shall be in force at the time when the carriage, receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, or storing, respectively, to which such freight, rate of freight, compensation, and reward shall relate, shall be or should have been done or performed: But it is expressly provided, That if change is made in the freight, rate of freight, compensation, or reward to be paid for the carriage, receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any property carried or to be carried wholly in one State or Territory, then the freight, rate of freight, charge, compensation, and reward, respectively, for the same or substantially the same or similar carriage, act or acts, service or services, for or as to any property to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, shall not be greater than the freight, rate of freight, compensation, and reward, respectively, for the same or substantially the same carriage, act or acts, service or services, for or as to property of the same, or substantially the same or similar kind, the carriage of which is or is to be performed within one State or Territory, done or performed, or which is to be or should have been done or performed at the same or substantially the same time or times.

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter, and thing hereinbefore declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid shall do, suffer, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, such corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person shall forfeit and pay to the corporation, company, person, or party who may sustain damage thereby, an amount equal to three times the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the corporation, company, person, or party so sustaining such damage, by action in any circuit or district court of the United States, in any district where such corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person can be found or shall have an office or place of business; and shall, for each offense, forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $1,000, to be recovered by the United States by action in any circuit or district court aforesaid, one-half of such penalty or penalties, when collected, to be paid to the informer. Any action to be brought as aforesaid to recover any such penalty or damages may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction, and discovery and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance, preliminary or final injunctions may, without allegation or proof of damage to any plaintiff or complainant, be granted upon proper application, restraining, forbidding, and prohibiting the commission or continuance of any acts, matters, or things within the terms or purview of this act prohibited or forbidden. In any action aforesaid, and upon any application for any injunction above provided for any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might, or might tend to, criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled, the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any such deposition or evidence, or the production of any books or papers may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any injunction aforesaid, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled, by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers, in or by chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. In actions to be brought as aforesaid, damages sustained in the period of a month or part of a month may be regarded as and counted or declared upon or complained of generally and as one separate cause of action, and so, whether such damages be sustained in one month or in different months; and such separate causes of action may be joined in the same action. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue.

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall directly or indirectly do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or directly or indirectly aid or abet therein; or shall directly or indirectly omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required to be done, not to be so done; or shall directly or indirectly aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall directly or indirectly be guilty of any infraction of this act, or directly or indirectly aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $1,000.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act contained shall apply or refer to the carriage, receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage, as aforesaid, less in quantity than the ordinary load of an ordinary freight-car when carried by railroad, or less than one ton when carried otherwise, unless some contract, arrangement, understanding, or act with respect to such property, or some part or parts thereof, or such property with other property, or such carriage, receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of the same, or of some part or parts thereof, or of the same with other property, shall be or has been made, had, done, or performed, with intent to evade some provision of this act: Provided always, That for all freights of less than a car-load when carried by railroad, or less than a ton when carried by other means of transportation, all the facilities and charges in reference thereto shall be uniform and equal to all for the same or similar service, and the penalties herein provided for shall apply to violations of this proviso: And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent the United States from making contracts, or enjoying those already made, for facilities and rates of transportation more advantageous than those accorded to the general public under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not embrace the transportation of articles which may be carried free, or at lower than schedule rates of freight, for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs or expositions for purposes of exhibition.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the bill be reprinted, because members cannot get hold of it now.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. HALE. I wish also to reserve points of order until we can see the bill in print. None of us can get it now.

The SPEAKER. The time to make points of order upon the bill is now, as the bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the gentleman from Texas does not intend to endeavor to press the bill through the House before members have even had an opportunity of reading it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Texas to have the bill considered in the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. For the present I desire to do so. The bill has been for a long time printed, and is one of such importance that it ought to be thoroughly considered, as I said before.

Mr. HALE. With the understanding that the gentleman does not intend to push it now, let it go over into the morning hour of to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will not expire for five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask the gentleman from Texas if this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know whether it is a unanimous report; it is the report of ten of the members of the committee; whether the eleventh member agrees to it I do not know. I desire to know whether, if the previous question is ordered, I shall be entitled to one hour to close the debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to one hour to close the debate.

Mr. BUCKNER. What time does the gentleman from Texas propose to allow for discussion?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not propose to occupy more than the morning hour.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am utterly opposed to this bill coming in to obstruct the business of the morning hour. I move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. EDEN. I suppose the gentleman from Texas will take no advantage of the House by moving the previous question this morning.

Mr. REAGAN. I have already stated that I do not propose to put the bill upon its passage to-day. I understand the importance of the bill and I should not ask the House to pass it without consideration, and gentlemen need give themselves no uneasiness upon that score.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, as the House may be under a misapprehension, that the two hours allowed to each committee are for reports. This bill has been once reported and it will continue in order in the morning hour as long as the House desires to discuss it.

Mr. BANNING. And cut off reports from all other committees?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word before the expiration of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two and a half minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill has but few objects. One is to prevent a discrimination in charges for freight by railroad companies against shippers; that is, that no higher rates shall be charged to one shipper than to another, that no advantage shall be given to one shipper over another. The object of the bill is to prevent unjust discriminations by transportation companies and as a corrollary to that they are forbidden by the bill under penalties to allow drawbacks or rebates in all cases, and they are also forbidden to enter into combinations for the purpose of discriminating against persons or places.

The only other material provision of the bill is that transportation companies shall not charge more freight for shorter distances than for longer distances, upon the same line. A gentleman near me suggests that we propose to regulate the pro rata rates of charges. The bill has no such provision in it. It contains no provision as to what charges shall be made, but only that they shall be equal as to all shippers and not greater for short distances than for long distances.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to section 4 and inquire of him whether that would not have the effect of regulating the rates?

Mr. REAGAN. I will tell the gentleman what the object of that section is. I think I recollect it, although it has been some time since I read the bill. The object of the fourth section is in relation to the rates of transportation of interstate commerce, providing that the charges upon interstate commerce shall not be greater than upon State commerce, and that that can be done by Congress has been decided by the courts and sustained by a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. EDEN. If I understand the gentleman, then take for instance a shipment from Pittsburgh and one from Chicago; the shipper from Chicago is not bound to pay the same rate as the shipper from Pittsburgh is bound to pay.

Mr. REAGAN. There is nothing in the bill on that subject. The transportation company may charge as much from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia as from Chicago to Philadelphia but they are not permitted to charge more.

Mr. McMAHON. What effect will this bill have on State laws in relation to this subject?

Mr. REAGAN. It does not affect them in any way.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will this bill come up in the morning hour of to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will not, because to-morrow will be private bill day. This bill remains in the morning hour, and will come up again for consideration when there is another morning hour for public business.

MARINE DANGER-SIGNAL.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4675) to establish a marine danger-signal; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. EDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole and will resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph of the bill.

The paragraph was read, as follows:

Pension Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $2,250; twenty clerks of class 4; forty clerks of class 3; sixty clerks of class 2; one hundred clerks of class 1; thirty-four clerks, at $1,000 each; one skilled mechanic, at $1,200; fifty-five copyists, at $900 each; one engineer, at $1,200, and one assistant engineer, at $1,000; seven assistant messengers; six pages, at $480 each; and for laborers and watchmen, $6,000; in all, $412,670.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is to increase the compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions from $3,600 to $4,000 a year. Upon that amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] made the point of order that it increased the compensation of an officer and was against existing law.

Mr. LYNDE. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SPARKS. I must insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being insisted upon, the Chair of course is compelled to decide it. The section of the Revised Statutes to which the Chair was referred fixed the compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions at $4,000. That section was a part of what is known as the salary act, passed March 3, 1873. That act was repealed by the act of June 20, 1874, and by that repealing act the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, with other salaries, was put back to what it was before, which the Chair believes was the amount named in this bill. The Chair, therefore, is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. CASWELL. The salary by the repealing act was made $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, it is made larger by the appropriation bill. Still the point of order is good as against the amendment.

Mr. CASWELL. Does the Chair hold that the repeal of the salary act revived former salaries?

The CHAIRMAN. The repealing act provides that hereafter officers shall receive the same salaries they were entitled to before that salary act was passed.

Mr. CASWELL. As I think the decision of the Chair would be establishing a dangerous precedent, I must respectfully appeal from it.

Mr. HANNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANNA. Do I understand that the ruling of the Chair involves the idea that the repeal of a statute revives former law?

The CHAIRMAN. The repealing act expressly revived the former law, which gave the Commissioner of Pensions a salary of $3,000. The last appropriation bill fixed the salary at $3,600. The Chair holds that the amendment is an increase of salary not warranted by law.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. The salary is fixed yearly by an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. By reference to the old statute it will be found that the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions was $3,000 a year; the appropriation bill of last year made it $3,600. An appeal having been taken from the decision of the Chair, the question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this committee?

Mr. CASWELL. Upon that question I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; there being but 15 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Clerk read the following under the head of "Pension Office:"

For actual and necessary expenses of clerks detailed to investigate suspected frauds and attempts at fraud, as provided by law, $40,000.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful for the Commissioner of Pensions, acting under the Secretary of the Interior, to drop pensioners from the rolls upon ex parte statements taken by special agents; but in all cases where evidence is taken to drop persons from the pension-rolls the pensioners shall be notified to attend and cross-examine if they choose to do so. Section 4744 of the Revised Statutes is hereby modified to conform to this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. VANCE. I think it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] make the point of order?

Mr. PAGE. I do not.

Mr. VANCE. I understand the Committee on Appropriations has agreed to accept the amendment without debate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

United States Patent Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, $4,500; for assistant commissioner, $3,000; for chief clerk, $2,000; three examiners-in-chief, at $3,000 each; examiner in charge of interferences, $2,500; trade-mark examiner, $2,500; twenty-two principal examiners, at $2,250 each; twenty-two first assistant examiners, at $1,600 each; twenty-two second assistant examiners, at $1,400 each; twenty-two third assistant examiners, at $1,200 each; one financial clerk, $2,000, who shall give bond in such amount as the Secretary of the Interior may determine; one machinist, $1,600; four clerks of class 4; five clerks of class 3, (one of whom shall be translator of languages, and act also as librarian, and shall receive an additional sum of $200;) sixteen clerks of class 2; and twenty-five clerks of class 1; twenty-five clerks, at $1,000 each; for sixty copyist-clerks, at $900 each; for three skilled draughtsmen, at $1,200 each; for one messenger and purchasing-clerk, $1,000; for one skilled laborer, $1,200; for ten attendants in model-room, at $900 each; and for laborers, $27,600; three folders and pasters, at $480 each; in all, $358,640.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to increase the compensation of the chief clerk from $2,000 to $2,500; also to increase the compensation of the principal examiners from $2,250 to $2,500, of the first assistant examiners from $1,600 to $1,800, of the second assistant examiners from $1,400 to $1,600, and of the third assistant examiners from $1,200 to $1,400, each. The object of my amendment is to restore the salaries of the chief clerk, of the twenty-two principal examiners, of the twenty-two first assistant, twenty-two second assistant, and twenty-two third assistant examiners to the amounts now fixed by law.

I have offered this amendment by direction of the Committee on Patents. It is the opinion of that committee that no further reduction ought to be made in the salaries of the officers I have mentioned. The last Congress reduced the salary of the chief clerk 10 per cent., and this bill proposes to reduce it to $2,250. It is an important office and we think the salary should not be further reduced.

The salaries of the examiners and assistant examiners were established thirty years ago. The positions which these men hold are more important than those of mere clerks; they do not occupy the positions of mere copyists or clerks, but they are experts. Some of these men are lawyers and some scientific men. We think it would be unwise to reduce their salaries, for in many instances these men, if a reduction should take place, would retire, whereby the Patent Office and the country would suffer.

I have received letters from inventors in different parts of the country urging that the salaries of the examiners should not be reduced. When these salaries were fixed thirty years ago the compensation of a member of Congress was $8 a day. Our own salaries have been advanced until they are now $5,000 a year. We ask merely that the pay of these men shall remain as it is; we are not asking for any increase of their salaries. We leave it to the Committee of the Whole to settle whether it is wise to make the reduction here proposed.

Mr. ATKINS. This amendment involves a very large addition to the amount of this bill. I have not been able in the hurry of debate to calculate how much; but the amount is many thousands of dollars. There is scarcely a chief clerk of any bureau of this Government (with here and there perhaps an exception) that receives more than $2,000. The proposition here is to increase the salary of the chief clerk to $2,250.

Mr. VANCE. It is not an increase.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; it is, because the salary as provided by the last appropriation act is $2,000.

Mr. VANCE. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ATKINS, (referring to a document.) I find I was mistaken. The amount appropriated heretofore is $2,250. Still I say that there is scarcely a bureau in the Government where the chief clerk gets more than $2,000. There are a few, but a very few.

So far as these examiners are concerned, I admit that it requires in many instances some legal talent to be an examiner; but a great deal of work that is put upon these examiners requires very little legal acumen or learning. Yet here is a sweeping proposition to increase the salaries of the principal examiners to $2,550. The gentleman from North Carolina may have meant $2,500; but his amendment reads $2,550.

Mr. VANCE. If it does it is a mistake.

Mr. ATKINS. More than that, the class of third assistant examiners was provided a few years ago as a temporary provision only, in order that copies of drawings might be brought up, a work which they said could be done in two or three years. Here is a report of the Commissioner of Patents in 1875, declaring that in a year or two these copies of drawings could all be completed. I understand it to be a fact that the copies referred to will be completed during this fiscal year, if they are not already completed; and it was represented to us that when this work should be done these third assistant examiners could be dispensed with entirely. But, instead of that, here is the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Patents, not only proposing to continue this class, which we unfortunately have done in our bill, but proposing to increase their salaries.

Moreover, I understand it to be a fact that in this class of third assistant examiners there are to-day several vacancies. I am informed upon reliable authority that there are women who are now performing the duties of third assistant examiners; I am informed that even pages are discharging these duties. I have no doubt that this bill provides ample salary for the services of all these officers.

Mr. LATHROP. I move, pro forma, to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is entirely mistaken in the supposition that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] increases salaries. The salaries of these examiners were established in 1848, when the business and the receipts of the Patent Office were not one-twelfth what they are to-day. These salaries have been continued at this figure till the present time when it is proposed in this bill to reduce them from $2,500 to $2,250.

GENERAL LIBRARY University of MICHIGAN

What the fact may be with regard to these assistant examiners, first, second, and third, I do not know, for I have not examined that question; but I do know as a matter of fact that the salary of examiners in the Patent Office was fixed at $2,500 in 1848, and this amount has been regularly appropriated up to the present time. The Committee on Appropriations, while they have in one case raised the salary to $2,500 where last year but $2,250 was appropriated, have in this bill cut down the salaries of examiners to $2,250.

With all respect to the Committee on Appropriations, (because I believe when they act in the direction of economy they ought to be supported,) I say that this proposed reduction is not economy. In respect to the Patent Office we are appropriating money which does not belong to the Government nor to the tax-payers of this country. It is money which was never paid in as taxes. From the foundation of the Government it has been the practice to ask inventors—not as a tax, for it has never been the policy of this Government to make it penal for a man to devise an invention for the good of mankind—it has been the practice to ask inventors to pay in something that might make this office self-sustaining in return for the advantages secured to inventors by the protection of the Government. Last year, with the salaries as they have been, this office paid into the National Treasury $121,000. This office has not only paid $400,000 or $500,000 to erect the building known as the Interior Department, but it has to-day in the Treasury to its credit nearly $1,200,000—not raised by taxes, but contributed by the brain and thought of this country. And now it is proposed to reduce the pay of these servants of the inventors of the land—not by way of saving taxes, but, to tell the truth, by way of plundering the thought and energy of the country. I do not think this is fair or honest; and I do not believe this House will do it.

If there is any class in this whole community which requires at the threshold of securing its rights, competent men, men of ability, it is this class of inventors. These salaries established in 1848 are now proposed to be reduced.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am an economist. I will go as far as he who goes farthest in the line of retrenchment and economy. I would rather reduce than increase salaries; and if I thought the amendments of the chairman of the Committee on Patents increased the salaries of these officers one single dollar I should vote against them. I am opposed to high salaries and I believe they are already large enough. The simple and plain fact, however, in this case is, that these amendments do not raise these salaries one single dollar. The salary received by the principal examiners under the present law is $2,500. The salaries of assistant examiners are $1,800, $1,600, and $1,400, respectively. The Committee on Appropriations has cut them down $250 and $200 respectively. The amendments are simply for the purpose of restoring the salaries of the examiners to the amount fixed by law as long ago as 1848 and 1855, during a period of low salaries and democratic economy. The salaries of members of Congress were then one-half of what they are now. The committee does not cut down the salary of the examiner of trade-marks, but increases it $250. The duties of this examiner call for the exercise of less skill and learning than are demanded of the principal examiners. Sir, if the salaries of one class are reduced, let all be reduced.

As I said a moment ago, I am an economist and I believe when we bring back the administration of the affairs of this Government to the line of economy practiced under the administration of the democratic party we will have done well enough for the people and the people will be well satisfied. When we get back to the practices of the day when the administration of the Government cost the people something less than $60,000,000, that sum being the highest amount of the cost of the National Government under any administration of the democratic party, when we can get back to the salaries and expenditures prior to the incoming of the republican party, I think we will have done well enough.

Now, does this go back to the salaries of that period? It does. In 1848 the salary of the principal examiners of the Patent Office was fixed at $2,500, and that of the assistant examiners as proposed in the amendments were fixed under a democratic administration. They have never been disturbed from those dates to the present time. I believe they should still remain at the amounts so fixed by our democratic predecessors, and therefore I favor the amendment.

I will say a word in regard to the character of these offices. There are no officers under this Government who have in their hands matters of more material interest to the people than the examiners in the Patent Office. They are placed there for the purpose not only of protecting the rights of the true and honest inventors, but also to protect the people from men who seek to plunder them by obtaining unnecessary and useless patents. These officials by proper discharge of their duties prevent men getting patents improperly by which they can go into the country and harass and plunder innocent parties who have in some manner infringed upon what is claimed to be the rights of the patent-right harpies. If these examiners do their duty faithfully and intelligently, they will protect the people from the issue of such patents as never should be issued.

The men who discharge these duties are, or should be, gentlemen of scientific attainments and judicial knowledge. I am acquainted with only one examiner in the Patent Office, and I know him to be a man of high order of scientific attainments and legal knowledge, and well qualified for the position he holds. The position requires as much scientific skill and knowledge as any department of the Government, except perhaps, the legal department of the Government. If you want men of the requisite capacity and integrity to discharge these duties, you must give them salaries which justify them in leaving business in private life to take these positions. The labor of these officers is not clerical. The labor they have to do is scientific, legal, and calls for brain-work and sound discretion. When these salaries were first fixed, those who named them intended they should be sufficient to command that order of talent and integrity which would be the best protection to the people, and do justice to the honest inventors.

In conclusion, I will say that I have voted in favor of every proposition brought forward by this Committee on Appropriations in the way of retrenchment, economy, and reduction, and I will continue on that line; but I am not in favor of so reducing the salary of these officers below a point where it will command the talent and integrity of the country in discharging the important and responsible duties devolved upon them by law, and for that reason I will give my support to the amendments which are pending. I prefer to adhere to the precedents and practices established by the democratic party when its wise statesmen were governing this land. The policy of that party is of the chief glory of the Republic. The days of its administration of the National Government are the halcyon days of our country. I propose, by voting for these amendments, to follow the law as made by that party. It is very difficult to improve upon democratic economy established in the best days of the past. We will at least do well enough to adhere to the line then established.

Mr. FOSTER. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations assenting to this proposition, I have a word to say.

It has been stated, Mr. Chairman, by my friend from Illinois that because the Patent Office was a self-sustaining institution therefore we ought not to reduce the salary of these clerks. I think if there is anything at all in the argument it is this: that the profits of the Patent Office should go to the clerks who are running it. On the contrary, I hold it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations and of this House to look after the appropriations for the Patent Office just as closely as if it were not a paying institution. I will say the Commissioner of Patents and all the examiners are first-class men, but what do we see? Compared with other bureaus of the Interior Department the Patent Office stands on stilts. The Commissioner of Patents gets $4,500. I do not say it is too much, but the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, holding an equally responsible position I think, gets $3,000. But gentlemen point to the fact that these examiners' salaries were fixed in 1848. I will tell my friend that was in the days of democratic extravagance. This is a time of democratic economy. What do we see? We see the chief clerk of every bureau in the Interior Department gets $2,000.

I undertake to say that there is a gentleman in the Indian Office, having charge of affairs there, getting but $1,800, whose duties are infinitely more responsible than those of any one of these expert gentlemen referred to by my friend from Illinois. Now, I do not say that these gentlemen are getting too much, but I say that comparatively they are the best paid of any of our public servants here in Washington—altogether the best paid. I do not say they are paid too much, but I do say, compared with the rest, they are getting a great deal more. You may make this comparison with any bureau in the Interior Department and you will find these men in the Patent Office are paid much more than is paid for corresponding services in any other bureau.

If this be a self-sustaining institution, so much the better. But if we receive too much from it, I say reduce the cost of securing patents to the inventors. As regards the payment of the employés of the Government, our duty is precisely the same to the Patent Office as to the Indian Office. We should practice precisely the same economy there as we do in the other bureaus of the Government.

Mr. SAMPSON. I am satisfied that it is in the interest of economy to retain skillful and experienced men in this bureau. I believe it will save expenses to this Government. The courts of the United States are now burdened with cases for the determination of the rights of inventors in relation to patents. These examiners have to pass upon those cases originally. They have to determine the fact whether, when an application is made for a patent for an invention, it is a new and useful invention. It requires men of great learning and of scientific experience and skill to do this; and it certainly is for the interest of this Government to retain men in that position that are competent to pass upon these questions.

It is well known that we have frequent cases of interference of patents; and those cases, if a patent is granted that interferes with another, must eventually be determined in the courts. We want a man right in the Patent Office who can determine whether one patent interferes with another or not.

As a matter of fact, men of peculiar skill and experience are retiring year after year from this position because they can make more money in a practice as patent lawyers. They are passing out of the Patent Office because the Government compensation is not sufficient. Now it is to the interest of the Government, it is to the interest of the inventors and to the interest of the people to retain skillful men in that position.

We are aware, also, that very many trifling patents are issued as things are now, patents that are not new and not useful; and this is because they have not been sufficiently and thoroughly examined in the Patent Office by the examiners. They go out into the country as new and useful inventions when perhaps they are old, and the people of the country are imposed upon. It does seem to me justice to the inventors and to the public, and the interest of economy demand that the salaries of these examiners should remain as they are now fixed by law.

Mr. WAIT. I do not claim that the salaries of these examiners should be increased upon the ground that the Patent Office is a self-sustaining institution, the General Government not being called upon to render it pecuniary aid, but I believe that it is for the interest of the public that the labor of these gentlemen should be fairly rewarded and that their salaries should be increased so as to command the services of intelligent, educated, skilled men, men that are systematically and thoroughly trained to perform not only the very onerous, but the very delicate and complicated duties which are thrown upon them. There cannot be any more varied and difficult duties than those which are cast upon these examiners in the Patent Office.

Probably no State in the Union has a greater interest in the matter of patent rights than the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I know that the people of Connecticut, who have great pecuniary interests in every variety and form of patents, feel a deep interest in having the duties of this class of employés in the Patent Bureau properly discharged by intelligent and competent men who are able by an examination of the various questions of fact and of law that constantly spring up in these cases to determine the rights of parties who are making applications for new patents or are contending against infringements on existing patents. Questions are constantly arising between parties with regard to their rights which demand on the part of these officers careful examination, thorough research, peculiar skill, and professional knowledge for their proper and successful consideration and determination.

I say, therefore, a very different rule should govern us here in remunerating these officers from that which should govern us in remunerating clerks in any other department. Men inferior in many ways, possessed of less education, inferior in intellect, having less experience in the examination and decision of varied and perplexing questions, can discharge what are termed very important duties in other departments of the Government; but that class of men could not discharge the complex and important duties that are put upon these examiners in the Patent Office, who are called upon, as I have said, to pass upon very nice distinctions of law and questions of fact; questions, too, that interest parties to the extent of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars. I know that the host of inventors in Connecticut feel that Congress should place in this bureau employés who are competent to appreciate and protect their interests and enforce their rights.

Now, when this department not only sustains itself, but is in fact a source of income to the General Government, I say that the parties who are interested in patent rights may very well call upon Congress to put and keep men of ability and intelligence in the positions named; men who are specially educated to discharge these very important duties which the laws of the United States devolve upon them. This amendment I think commends itself to the favorable consideration and support of the members of this House.

The formal amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. VANCE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for two minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to say that the Committee on Patents has no feeling in this matter. We have no desire to antagonize the Committee on Appropriations. But it is our cool judgment that the salaries of the officers referred to should not be diminished. We do not propose to increase the pay of these officers, and if my amendment shows an increase it is an error. We propose to let the salaries stand as they were fixed by the last Congress, which we think is low enough. I will call attention to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations has increased the salary of the trade-mark examiner, and I think his duties are not so important as those of some of the other examiners.

I will say further that the Patent Office stands in a different relation to the country from any other service. The people are not taxed to support it. The inventors of the country pay fees sufficient for its support, and last year, after paying all the expenses, there was a surplus of $105,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I have but a word to say. This amendment increases the amount appropriated by the bill $18,950 and I want the committee to understand that fact. Now I want to say one other word. We have in this bill provided for three examiners-in-chief at a salary of $3,000 each. This is an appellate court. Gentlemen have been talking so much about the ability and legal acumen necessary to constitute an examiner, but we allow in this bill, in addition to all these, a board of three chief examiners, who constitute an appellate court; and if there are any difficult cases these cases can be appealed to that court; and we propose to pay them well, and pay them more than any lawyer in the country makes outside of the cities.

Mr. O'NEILL. Does the gentleman know what severe examinations these gentlemen have to undergo before they can obtain promotion from third assistant to second assistant and from second to first? Does he know the severe ordeal these assistants have to go through before they can be promoted? There are no more intelligent men to be found here, and they prepare the work which is finally done by the chief examiners.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not attacking the intelligence of these gentlemen at all; but $2,250 is a pretty considerable sum and ought to command great intelligence and learning.

Mr. O'NEILL. Why do you keep up the salary of the examiner of trade-marks, although I do not by any means think it should be decreased, and not retain the present salaries of the examiners and assistants? They are all men of scientific and legal knowledge and appointed because they are such.

Mr. ATKINS. There are very few lawyers in the country who make $2,250 a year, and they are men just as learned as these are. But the argument of the gentlemen who desire to have this large amendment attached to the bill goes to the point that the committee is proposing to degrade this class of officers. We have in a few instances cut down salaries, but we leave the examining board, to whom all these cases are appealed, at salaries of $3,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. Why did you increase the salary of the trade-mark examiner?

Mr. ATKINS. We only put it back where it was last year.

Mr. O'NEILL. Why not keep up the salaries of the other examiners at the same point? They are just as worthy of it.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, the people at large more than the Government are interested in having able and efficient men in these positions. The number of patents issued every year exceeds, I think, fifteen thousand; and the complaint is that patents are improperly allowed, so that a patentee is not safe in his title when he receives his certificate and not sure in the knowledge that he has exclusive property in an entirely new invention.

In order to make this large number of patents perfectly safe, it is absolutely necessary to have in these positions men fitted by long experience and by education for the duties they are called upon to perform and the functions it is their business to exercise. Anybody who is acquainted with the complications of machinery, the intricacies and the numerous difficulties that arise in the business of this office, will not hesitate to admit that the discharge of its duties requires a peculiar kind of knowledge that is applicable alone to the sphere in which these men are engaged. That knowledge cannot be picked up in a day, or a week, or a year, but it requires study and expert knowledge; and I submit to the good sense of the committee that men ought to be kept in these positions who have experience and ability properly to discharge the duties, so that the applicant for a patent, when he receives a certificate, will know that he has a judgment from an office on the decree of which he can rely, and that when his case has passed the scrutiny of the Patent Office he will have a decision in which he can trust with confidence in perfecting his inventions and bringing them into public use.

The question was taken on Mr. VANCE's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 52, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VANCE and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 70.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I shall call for a vote upon this question in the House.

Mr. LATHROP. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to further amend the pending paragraph by inserting before the words "one machinist" the words "one librarian, $1,800;" also to strike out the word "five" before the words "clerks of class 3" and insert "four;" also strike out the words "and act also as librarian and shall receive an additional sum of $200;" also to change the total of the paragraph from $358,640 to $358,840.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office, namely: For construction and repair of model-cases, stationary portfolios for drawings, furniture and labor connected therewith, repairing, papering, painting, carpets, ice, advertising, books for library, moneys refunded, printing engraved patent-heads, international exchanges, extra labor on indexes and abstracts for annual reports, and other contingencies, $50,000; Provided, That not more than $10,000 of this sum may be used for employment of temporary clerks at not more than the rate of $1,000 per annum for each clerk; and no money appropriated by this paragraph shall be expended for advertising in newspapers published in the city of Washington other than the Patent Office Official Gazette.

Mr. LATHROP. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the word "indexes," in line 1550, the words "or abstracts of patents and printing the same;" also to change the amount appropriated in the paragraph from $50,000 to $75,000; also to add to the paragraph the following:

And persons to whom patents may hereafter be granted shall, in addition to the fees now allowed by law, pay the actual cost and expense of printing their respective patents, to be estimated and determined by the Commissioner of Patents.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I think my amendment as a whole will not increase expenditures at all, but on the contrary will yield an additional revenue from this deserving class of people and for their benefit. I am sure it will commend itself even to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Commissioner of Patents in his report has recommended that a sum be appropriated for the purpose of preparing, printing, and publishing abstracts or indexes of patents. The object of that is that the vast number of patents shall be indexed or abstracted under heads, so that whoever may have occasion to examine and ascertain what patents are in existence will find them under their specific heads. As it is now the inventors of the country are subjected to a vast expense to make this examination. The Commissioner of Patents in a letter which I have here in my hand says that $15,000 might be profitably and economically expended in preparing and publishing these indexes or abstracts of patents.

In his report made to Congress last winter he recommends that $10,000 be appropriated out of the surplus fund of the office for the purpose of supplying the library with scientific works so as to bring it up to the standard of the present day, in order that those having business with the office, as well as the officers themselves, might be advised of the present state of the arts. Inasmuch as these appropriations are needed for the advantage of inventors and for the promotion of the general interests of the country, I have, in order that it may meet with no earthly objection, incorporated a provision that from this time on patentees shall pay each man for the printing of his own patent.

The number of patents issued last year was between thirteen and fourteen thousand. The very lowest estimate of the cost and expense of printing one of these patents is $2; many of them would cost a much larger sum. The provision which I have incorporated in my amendment will certainly raise more than money enough to cover the proposed increase of expenditures for purposes of vital importance to the inventive genius of the country. I think they would cheerfully pay this additional price because of the advantage which they will receive from it.

I append the following extract from the report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1877, showing the receipts and expenditures of the Patent Office for the year 1877; showing the amount of surplus in the Treasury of the United States paid in by the Patent Office in excess of its expenditures; also showing by States and Territories the residence of persons to whom patents have been issued during the year 1877, and the comparative business of the office from 1837 to 1877, both inclusive, namely:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

In compliance with section 494 Revised Statutes, I submit the following report for the year ending December 31, 1877:

1. Statement of moneys received.

Amount received on applications for patents, reissues, designs, extensions, caveats, disclaimers, appeals, and trade-marks	$651,569 00

Mr. ATKINS. I regret to rise here for the purpose of opposing an amendment which, if adopted, will increase the expenditures proposed by this bill. And, but for what I conceive to be my solemn duty, I would not rise any more to protest against the increase of expenditures in this bill. Having been charged by the Committee on Appropriations with the conduct of this bill, I will say that, if it is the judgment and will of this House to run up the expenditures under it, I have not one word to say. If they want to add hundreds and thousands, ay, millions of dollars to this bill, why it is none of my business.

But a moment ago we appropriated $20,000 by way of an increase of salaries over and above the salaries fixed by the last Congress, and no quorum voted upon that proposition. I did not raise the question of a want of a quorum, because I did not desire to stop public business; but I want to say to the country that we are here voting away thousands of dollars and there is no quorum voting.

We gave $60,000 in the bill of last year for this item. Before any appropriation was made this year in the deficiency bills to cover some of these very identical items, the estimate of the Department was for $80,000. When the deficiency bills came in, making large appropriations for some of these purposes, some of them were stricken out in the Book of Estimates, at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Patents himself. It was agreed, upon consultation between the Commissioner of Patents and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] who served with me upon the subcommittee, that $50,000 was enough for this purpose; yet here comes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LATHROP] proposing to increase the amount to $75,000.

Very well; I suppose we will have to submit to it; for it is a proposition to increase expenditures. The very first appropriation which was made in this Congress for this purpose was $45,000 in a deficiency bill. It is true that they had a fire in the Patent Office; and the estimate of the Department for $80,000 was based upon the fact that they had had that fire, and it was to supply many things that were destroyed. That estimate was made up before the beginning of this session. Here then is $45,000 in this deficiency bill to cover these identical items, which, added to the $50,000 we now propose to give, would really amount to $95,000, $15,000 more than the estimates.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is time for this House to stop. If we are to go on at the rate we are going on, we shall enlarge the dimensions of this bill far beyond the corresponding law of the last Congress. We are claiming to be a party of economy. Sir, it is for gentlemen upon this floor to make their record not as partisans, not as democrats or as republicans. It is their own individual record that they will make. Talk to me about party! Sir, I recognize no party in this matter. I see that there are gentlemen on this side of the House as well as on the other who generally vote for every increase of expenditures. Candor compels me to say this.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LATHROP] has offered an amendment for an appropriation which is not estimated for. There is no estimate here for the abstract of patents. Gentlemen may look through this Book of Estimates and they will find no such estimate whatever. They will find an estimate for abstract of annual reports; and that is provided for. I put it to the House whether they are prepared to vote $25,000 for a proposition that has not been estimated for by the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have heard from the gentleman from Tennessee so many times that he has come to a conclusion in regard to the business of this House, and therefore no other man must say a word——

Mr. ATKINS. That allusion is altogether unworthy of the gentleman; and it is not true, if he intends to insinuate that I have assumed any such dictatorial position. I want to say to the gentleman, once for all, that I will not submit to any such assertion on his part without rebuking it upon the spot.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman who has had ten minutes keep still a moment? Let him rest.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the gentleman keep himself within the line of parliamentary remark.

Mr. CONGER. My remark was that the gentleman had so often said that he and his committee had come to a conclusion—that he had talked against his own party friends and against the republicans here in a speech unworthy of the chairman of an appropriation committee, because members see fit to introduce amendments—till I had heard it as many times as was agreeable. The gentleman to-day narrows down that same running remark to himself and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.] When he comes to read his speech, he will see that the prelude to that pathetic and feeling address which he delivered, turning first to his political associates and then to the republicans, consisted in saying that he and his colleague on the committee, my friend from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,]—that these two, the representatives of all the knowledge and all the judgment of this House, had agreed on this proposition, and that it was presumptuous for any other man to assume to know anything or even to offer an amendment.

Sir, my friend from Illinois, [Mr. LATHROP,] who is as well able to judge as the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other man, what amendments are proper in this House; my friend from Illinois, who has been an active and earnest member of the Committee on Patents, has presumed here to introduce an amendment which he and all gentlemen who have the knowledge they ought to have in regard to the Patent Office (a knowledge which would not injure the gentleman from Tennessee with all his accumulated information) know to be for the benefit of inventors and of the people; and he is denounced for it.

Mr. ATKINS. Denounced! There is no gentleman in this House for whom I have more respect than the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so. I wish he would show his respect for the gentleman when he makes these tirades, and when he says every gentleman in this House must stand upon his own record. Who is not willing to stand on his own record? Who authorizes the gentleman from Tennessee to remind us that each man stands or falls by his own acts?

But, sir, it is preposterous for the gentleman to make remarks in regard to the Patent Office spending the money of the Government. Does he or does he not know that the inventors of this country, taxed for their inventions, have paid into the Treasury of the United States and are paying year by year a larger amount by several hundred thousand dollars than is expended for their Commissioner, for their examiners, for their clerks, for printing their patents, and for the entire expenditures of the Government connected with the Patent Office? Why should not the inventors of the country have the benefits demanded by the gentleman from Illinois when they have paid into the Treasury hundreds of thousands of dollars more than enough to pay every expense connected with the Patent Office?

The gentleman talks about money in the Treasury. I admit that he has the right to be careful of money in the Treasury; but he is talking about an expenditure of the inventors' money for their benefit. Why should he oppose it if the amendment is proper, if this abstract is desirable?

My friend from Illinois has added to his amendment what I never would have added—a provision for an additional expense, an additional burden upon the inventive genius of the country. He proposes to require the inventors to pay for this additional privilege, so that it shall not be even an increased demand upon the funds of the inventors now in the Treasury.

Does the gentleman from Tennessee know much about patents and the patent laws and the Patent Office? Does he know that there is sleeping in the Treasury of the United States a surplus of several hundred thousand dollars derived from the tax we have put upon the inventive genius of the country, more than is needed to pay every expense connected with the Patent Office? If he does not know this, in Heaven's name let him not object to those who have knowledge offering amendments here for the benefit of inventors and for the benefit of the country, amendments coming from members of the Committee on Patents who know what they are asking, who know these propositions represent the wishes of the people. Let not the gentleman from Tennessee preach these tirades against his own party and ourselves when amendments of this kind are offered. Why this need of arraying himself so boldly against every amendment? Why need he tell us he will decline to protest further? Why tell the House if members dare to offer amendments here against his will they may possibly lose his valuable services on the committee at all?

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to say but a few words directly on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. I will ask the Clerk to read it so the House will see what we are talking about.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DURHAM. I have no hesitation in saying, after having given all these Departments careful examination, that the Patent Office is by far the most expensive under the operation of the Government. The clerks, as was well stated by the chairman of the committee, were better paid, and for that reason I did advocate the reduction of the clerks as reported in this bill. I believed that amount was ample to secure the services of any first-class clerk. And if this House or the committee had stood by the Committee on Appropriations in this reduction I venture the assertion there is not one single one who would have resigned his position.

What I do object to is, gentlemen will come upon the floor of this House—not but what it is their right to do so—and offer amendments not asked for by the heads of the Departments. I do protest in the name of the inventors of this country against this amendment. You are talking about the inventive genius of the country. I want to foster and protect that Patent Office Department, but I will never levy a tax upon it.

What does the gentleman's amendment propose to do? It proposes to tax the inventive genius of the country that it shall pay for this printing, and in the next breath you turn around and say it is more than a self-sustaining institution. I know men in my country, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Connecticut knows men in his country, who absolutely are not able without outside assistance to pay for this printing. How are they to get along? I say let the inventive genius of the country be as free and untrammeled—shall I speak about the bird of freedom?

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. DURHAM. I say let the inventive genius of the country be free and untrammeled, and as this Department does more than pay its expenses I pray gentlemen not to put a tax on it and require inventors to pay for the printing of these matters.

On the other side, $25,000 is moved in addition for contingent expenses, I desire to say—not that I object to gentlemen introducing it, or, if it seems proper to the House, voting down the Committee on Appropriations—but I do say to gentlemen, after having investigated the matter thoroughly, the $50,000 allowed for purposes of this sort, cutting out this amendment, is all that is necessary to carry on the legitimate operations of the Department. I do insist where the heads of the departments occasionally do ask for more—while they could expend it—whenever we have restricted them to a lower amount they have generally kept within that amount with a few exceptions.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. Or rather to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not this amendment divisible? One part requires the printing of abstracts, while another portion requires the inventors to pay. I should like to vote for one and against the other. Is not the amendment divisible?

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment embraces two separate, distinct, substantive propositions it is divisible under the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LATHROP. I renew the amendment. If the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee will look at the report of the Commissioner of Patents they will find distinctly recommended there the printing of these abstracts. I will send to the Clerk's desk to have read a letter from the Commissioner of Patents showing the necessity for this additional appropriation. It is simply stated that $15,000 in printing these abstracts may be profitably used.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you find it in the Book of Estimates, which governs the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. LATHROP. I have not looked at it at all. I have been looking to the interests of those whom I represent, in fact, and to the interests of the whole body of the people in this matter.

Mr. DURHAM. We can only be governed by the Book of Estimates, and I never saw it in that book. The Commissioner of Patents never laid it before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LATHROP. Every other country I know of has made provision for abstracts of patents. Ten thousand dollars is recommended as a distinct appropriation out of the surplus fund of this office to bring up the library so it shall be a scientific library; to bring it up to the present time for the benefit and advantage not only of the department, but of all the inventors of the land as well.

Mr. DURHAM. That is not in the Book of Estimates. Neither of them is in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. LATHROP. Ten thousand dollars is part of the $25,000 I propose. The other $15,000 is for making and printing indexes or abstracts of patents, in order that the inventors of the country when they have made an invention may have some place to go to ascertain whether really they are the first inventors or not. As it is to-day they have to go over the whole mass of patents. They should not be subjected to the trouble and expense when they have contributed these vast sums of money now attempted to be used and appropriated to the purposes of the ordinary expenses of this Government against right and against propriety. It is for their benefit that I ask that it may be done, and to put the inventors and patentees of this country in the same position as like classes of citizens are in every other civilized or really progressive country in the world, where they may get this knowledge and where they may have it without this vast and intolerable expense and where the whole people of the country may have the benefit of it.

Now one proposition more. I am as much opposed to taxing these people further as the gentleman from Kentucky, and more so. I happen to represent a constituency that is more interested in this very matter than the people of Kentucky. I believe these fees ought to be cut off. If the people cannot have the benefit of them, certainly they ought to be cut off. It is an absolute wrong. It is the old fable again of killing the goose that lays the golden egg to undertake to plunder these men of their earnings to run this Government with. But I felt that the advantages to the inventors of this country of these abstracts and bringing up this scientific library were so great that they had vastly better submit to this additional tax than go without them. There is more than $100,000 a year above the expenses of the Patent Office drawn out of them and they are demanding these advantages, and if they cannot get them otherwise I say they had better submit to further exaction and get these benefits which they so justly require. Now I would like to have the letter read.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemen has expired; the letter can only be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that by unanimous consent the letter be read.

There was no objection, and the letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1878.

SIR: Referring to the paragraph in my report for the year 1877 relating to the publication of indexes or abstracts for patents I think that $15,000 a year would be sufficient to commence the work. That amount of money could be economically and profitably used for the purpose in connection with the other business of the office; and in a few years with an annual appropriation of that amount complete abstracts might be furnished for the information of the country. The sale of such abstracts would in no very long time reimburse the Government in great part for the outlay.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ELLIS SPEAR,
Commissioner of Patents.

Hon. Mr. LATHROP,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I have received a great many communications recently the writers of which express the opinion that the patent laws ought to be abolished altogether. Now, I do not know as regards the correctness of the opinions of these gentlemen. A good many of them are scientific gentlemen, but whether their views and opinions are correct or not I cannot say. But there is one astounding fact that is growing daily of more importance, and that is the more invention you apply to labor-saving the greater incumbrance you put upon labor; or, in other words, you diminish the demand for labor.

With the vast number of laboring-men we have in this country the more cautious we should be in depriving them of the means of living, of supporting their families, and educating their children. Labor-saving inventions may be very beneficial to capital, but we must look to it that it does not interfere with the occupations of the laboring masses. Our first object should be to look to this.

Now, this is a question that is worthy of the serious consideration of this Congress or any other learned body of men. It will not do to educate the people with the idea that to be constantly making inventions does away with the necessity of labor. I am not in favor, Mr. Chairman, of putting a tax upon the genius or the inventive power of our people. I would give it full scope; I would give it full sway; but I would not let the inventive faculty take the bit in the mouth and run away from those great questions which are connected with the interests and development of labor.

The man who would condemn the great discoveries that have been made might well subject himself to unfavorable criticism; but as a general thing among our people some particular science or new discovery absorbs everything else, and that when you once mount a hobby-horse you are apt to ride the horse too far. You should not engage the attention of people in schemes which have in view either the disposing of labor or curtailing the demand for labor. I do not think that when our first parents went out of the garden of Eden they had much else upon their minds than to work for their living. The idea of labor-saving machines did not occupy their minds. They marched sullenly out and accepted the stern decree that in the sweat of their brow they should earn their bread; and they accepted the situation. It was one of labor of the hands, not of the brains. And who shall say that this was not all right and proper?

It never entered into their contemplation that they were to be relieved from that toil that was imposed upon them by the decree of God himself. We have become more wise. We would earn our bread by the inventive genius of our brains. Now, as far as that can accommodate the men who work with the brain that is well enough, but the great multitude who have not the brain which they can make useful in the way of invention must depend upon manual labor.

Now, if there is one thing which is of special importance in the political economy of this country, it is rewarding and encouraging labor and preventing idleness in all its shapes and all its forms. You cannot do this if you adopt measures constantly that are calculated to dispense with the demand that is made on the labor of the country. Labor-saving machinery is engaging the attention, I observe, of a great many learned men. I pray you do not say when I get up here and make these suggestions that I am putting a damper upon the geniuses of the country. There are men who have immortalized themselves by inventions, and by means of patents they have received protection for them. But this sort of policy of favoring inventions may be carried too far. There should be an equipoise somewhere. There should be an equilibrium somewhere. We cannot all resort to the invention of labor-saving machinery and at the same time protect the great interests of labor in this land. The spirit of invention has become a mania. It has engaged the attention of thousands of people, while success has not rewarded one in a hundred.

But it is not the bad consequences upon those who fail in success in making the invention profitable that concerns us, but it is a matter of vast moment to our people that their occupations should not be supplied by machinery. We should seek to find them employment—employment for all. In this idea the Chinese are ahead of us. They make it a cardinal point in government to encourage labor and furnish employment to all.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague allow me to understand him?

Mr. WRIGHT. Understand what?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What his position is; whether he is in favor of encouraging the inventive genius of our country or not?

Mr. SPARKS. He is in favor of protection of labor.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I confess I did not understand his speech on labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is out of order.

Mr. LATHROP. I withdraw my amendment temporarily.

Mr. KEIFER. I renew the amendment. I do not feel prepared to say that I am fully in accord with the mover of the amendment. I am very sorry that the committee which is so well presided over by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] does not take the pains to tell us when a question is brought up in relation to this appropriation bill just what the bill will do if it is allowed to remain as it was reported.

Now, I would like to know at the end of my speech whether this appropriation of $50,000 provided for in line 1551 will enable the Department to provide for the extra labor in the preparation of indexes and abstracts of patents and the printing of them. I would like to know if the amount is sufficient, because if it is I want to vote with the committee, but if not I shall have to vote against them.

Now, I understand that last year $60,000 was allowed for this same purpose, and that it did not enable the Patent Office to print the necessary indexes or to make them, to say nothing about the printing.

I do not believe in the latter part of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. I am utterly opposed to putting any further tax upon the men of genius of this country who are inventing patents. Most of them, according to my observation, are poor men, or men who at least have become poor, if not poor originally, in carrying out their experiments, on that which they hope to make valuable to themselves, but which at the last inure to the benefit of mankind. I do not think it wise policy for the Government to undertake to tax that class of men in this country to raise revenue.

I believe the fact is the $400,000 of surplus revenue which has arisen from the tax upon inventors has been used was in erecting buildings for the Interior Department. There is now in the Treasury, unexpended from this revenue, nearly $12,000,000. There was about, in round numbers, $16,000,000 standing to the credit of the Patent Office, all of which has been taken from this class of people. I would be glad to see the law so changed that you could command the best talent in America to put into this office—I mean the highest talent. It is a fact that ninety-nine out of a hundred of the patents coming out of that Patent Office for the last twenty years are absolutely void when they have passed through the crucible of the courts. The complaint comes to us from abroad that we are issuing patents in name and not in fact. There is some error in our system; perhaps we have not employed the right men. In England and France they do not issue a patent because some poor man imagines that he has made a new and useful invention, and hence they do not have their courts flooded with suits of patent cases.

That is not the worst of it. These men obtain patents and go out through the country and make the people believe that they have valuable patents, and they tax the public with them. A person charged with infringing upon one of these patents says: I cannot undertake to go through a lawsuit in a United States court, which is a great distance off, and therefore I will pay the penalty. Many of these patents are utterly void. I know in my own experience that old machinery that has been standing in my country unused for fifty years has been gathered up and a patent obtained upon it and the whole country is required to pay tribute to it.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not desire to detain the committee but for a few moments. I tried in the few remarks I made to answer the very question which the gentleman from Ohio has just put. I tried to explain that $50,000 is enough to cover all items in the estimates, for certain portions of the items have been stricken out at the request or by the advice of the Commissioner himself. Last year we gave $60,000 for this purpose. This year $80,000 was estimated for, including plumbing, gas-fitting, fitting up rooms, repairs for damages by fire and water, laborers, &c. I also tried to show that we had already given in a deficiency bill $45,000 which covered those items, and then in addition to that we have given $26,600.

I want to say that the Committee on Appropriations believe, after consultation with the Commissioner of Patents, that $50,000 is sufficient, not only for the purposes to which the gentleman refers, but for all the other purposes estimated for in this Book of Estimates, except those which the Commissioner of Patents consented should be stricken out as having been already provided for by deficiency appropriations. I believe I have made that as plain as any man can make it.

If I have said upon this floor one unkind word or made one unkind allusion to any gentleman, I am not aware of it. If I have been disrespectful to the House, I beg pardon of the House. I do not believe, however, that there is any gentleman on this floor who has any such idea as that, unless it is the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and I cannot believe that he really thinks so. But the remarks of the gentleman and his manner were personal to me in the highest degree. It was in the warmth of my feelings on that account that I made use of the expression I did to him while he was upon the floor.

It may be that I am not acquainted with the subject of which I am speaking. It is possible, as the gentleman insinuated, that I do not know that the Patent Office pays a revenue to the Government over and above all expenditures. I should not be very learned even if I did know that. I do not suppose that there is a gentleman on this floor who does not know it. I do not suppose there is a gentleman on this floor who has not read the report of the Commissioner of Patents, and knows that it is stated in that report that last year $105,000 was covered into the Treasury over and above all the expenditures of the Patent-Office Bureau.

But I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that he is not my censor; I am not here to be lectured by him. I am not conscious of ever having said to that gentleman one unkind word in any way, unless in reply to severe personal criticisms and abuse which he has offered me on this floor. This is not the place to settle matters of a personal nature, if there is any personal feeling in this thing. I do not intend to indulge in personal remarks; it is my desire to avoid them. This is no place for anything of that sort.

I hope that in the future discussions upon this floor which I may have with that gentleman we may get along and be able to discuss these matters without feeling, without anger, without passion, and address ourselves to the merits of the question, and that the gentleman will not for five minutes indulge in personal strictures upon my course.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] a question. Does the gentleman understand that any portion of the $50,000 appropriated in this paragraph can be used for printing the indexes or abstracts of patents? Can any part of this appropriation be used for the printing of these abstracts or indexes?

Mr. ATKINS. In lines 1549 and 1550 are these words: "extra labor on indexes and abstracts for annual reports."

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; that is for extra labor on them, but not for printing them. They were not printed last year, and the Committee on Appropriations have not made the slightest provision for printing them.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection, if the gentleman wants to do so, to insert the word "printing."

Mr. DURHAM. Permit me to say to my friend that this paragraph contains the words "extra labor on indexes and abstracts for annual reports."

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, that is extra labor in preparing the indexes and abstracts. But what part of this appropriation can be used for printing those indexes?

Mr. ATKINS. I think the language of the paragraph covers that.

Mr. LATHROP. There is no such thing as an annual report any more; there has not been for years.

Mr. WAIT. I would renew the formal amendment in order to have the opportunity to say a single word in response to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] who wants to know if I am desirous of imposing a further burden upon the inventive genius of my own State. I say to him that I am not, and therefore I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to have a division of this question, so that I may vote in favor of increasing the amount to be expended for extra labor on indexes and abstracts for annual reports, &c., and at the same time vote against imposing the expense for such labor on inventors. I am entirely opposed to that part of the amendment which proposes to tax the inventors for expenses incurred in the labor of preparing these indexes and abstracts. There is money enough in the hands of the Government coming over from this one source to pay for all the expenses without subjecting inventors at all to any burden of this character, as intimated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

At this point the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of Will R. Hervey;

An act (H. R. No. 2096) for the relief of James Fishback, late collector of internal revenue, tenth district, State of Illinois;

An act (H. R. No. 2818) to authorize T. and J. W. Gaff & Co. to use a certain building in the city of Aurora, Indiana, for the rectification of distilled spirits;

An act (H. R. No. 2884) for the relief of Samuel H. Canfield, postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut;

An act (H. R. No. 3068) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department;

An act (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespasses on public lands and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, for subsistence of the Army, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4394) to prohibit the coinage of the twenty-cent silver piece.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and proceeded with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I rose yesterday with the view of noticing some of the strictures which were made upon this side of the House by my colleague, the Speaker; and I deem it now an appropriate opportunity to do so, inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has seen fit to go further and lecture another member on this side for the course which has been pursued by the republican members of this body.

I desired yesterday as apropos to the question then under consideration to refer to the failure, as I thought, on the part of democratic members of this House to make a sufficient appropriation for the purpose of carrying on the Pension Bureau. I knew what had been the complaint on the part of pensioners of the Government and those who had not received their pensions for many years: that many applicants had failed year after year to receive what was due to them, in consequence, as I believed, of the inadequacy of force in the Pension Bureau. It was, however, urged that the proposed increase of force in that Department conflicted with Rule 120 of this House.

It was claimed by my colleague, the Speaker, that this rule was the result of democratic policy, and that it had saved to the Government millions of dollars. I do not doubt that this rule has saved to the Government millions of dollars; I do not doubt that it will save millions of dollars; nevertheless I doubt the expediency and the policy of the rule. I believe that my colleague, the Speaker, was held to an unjust account, perhaps, on this side of the House, for his rigorous support of economical measures. From his stand-point economy, to the last extent, is a necessity of overwhelming importance. From his stand-point and with reference to the policy of his party, economy, to the last extent, is a great and overmastering necessity. Why? Why, sir, a proposition has emanated from that side of the House to reduce the tax on whisky, which will entail upon the Federal Government a loss of $25,000,000 a year. Another proposition will soon emanate from that side of the House to reduce the tax on tobacco, which will entail an admitted loss of over $10,000,000 of revenue. A proposition has emanated from that side of the House in the shape of a tariff bill which will reduce the revenues of this Government at least nine and a half millions of dollars annually. The present status of the revenues of this Government shows that there is a deficiency of between two and three million dollars already. Yet this democratic policy of retrenchment and reform, of which my colleague, the Speaker, is a representative, has been advocated here, and is now set forth as the policy which is to lead the Government out of its difficulties and to save the country from numerous perils.

I rose to-day, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saying, as I would have said yesterday, if I had had the opportunity, that when this side of the House is lectured, as it was by my colleague, the Speaker, and as one of my friends on this side has been lectured to-day by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, such lectures are necessarily made from this stand-point; that under democratic policy the Government cannot derive sufficient revenue to meet its expenditures.

Mr. ATKINS. If there is a desire to continue this debate further I am willing that a limit shall be fixed in Committee of the Whole or in the House. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Possibly the gentleman from Illinois, who offered the pending amendment, will agree to the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, which will obviate the necessity of a division of the question.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Amend the first branch of the amendment by striking out in line 1550 the words "and abstract for annual reports."

I suppose there will be no objection to this amendment. It leaves standing the provision as to abstracts for patents, but it strikes out the provision for abstracts for annual reports.

Mr. LATHROP. I ask the Clerk to read the clause as it will read with the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Books for library, moneys refunded, printing engraved patent-heads, international exchanges, extra labor on indexes, and other contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. LATHROP. I think that does not quite meet the point.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; if it does not meet the view of the gentleman I withdraw it.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Tennessee will observe that his amendment does not meet the question of printing indexes.

Mr. ATKINS. I was not alluding to that; I was only addressing myself to the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for a division of the question on the amendment of the gentlemen from Illinois, [Mr. LATHROP.]

The CHAIRMAN. A division being called for, the question will be taken separately on the three branches of the amendment.

The first branch of the amendment was read, as follows:

In line 1550, after word "indexes," insert "or abstract of patents and printing the same."

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 52, noes 75.

The second branch of the amendment was read, as follows:

In line 1551, after word "contingencies," strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LATHROP. I withdraw the third branch of my amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "reports," in line 1550, the words "and printing the same." I trust the Committee on Appropriations will not object to this.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For photolithographing or otherwise producing plates for the Official Gazette, including pay of employés engaged on the Gazette, and for making similar plates, $35,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the word "five;" so as to make the amount of the appropriation $30,000 instead of $35,000.

Mr. KEIFER. I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will explain why he desires to cut down this appropriation as it stands in the bill. I assume that the Committee on Appropriations had some good reason for agreeing to the appropriation as reported.

Mr. ATKINS. On looking into the matter further the committee are of opinion that $30,000 is sufficient.

Mr. KEIFER. Allow me to ask whether $35,000, the amount provided for in the bill, is the sum that the Commissioner of Patents desired should be appropriated for photolithographing.

Mr. ATKINS. No. He asks for $40,000, and finally he was of the opinion that $35,000 was sufficient. The Committee on Appropriations investigated the matter and came to the conclusion that $30,000 was sufficient.

Mr. KEIFER. It is proposed, then, to reduce it?

Mr. ATKINS. Twenty-seven thousand and five hundred dollars was the appropriation last year, and there was no deficiency.

Mr. KEIFER. That may be. Mr. Chairman, but it ought to be just as the chairman of the committee stated; there ought to have been no deficiency, but the question is still left whether or not there was sufficient last year. We know from the history of the Patent Office in the last few days, or the last few weeks I may say, that the number of patents issued has been a vast increase on any issue in any former period.

It is said we had no deficiency in this matter last year. I have no doubt the Commissioner of the Patent Office when he said $40,000 was what he needed really meant that that was the amount he needed in view of the increased business of the country. I believe it will be found when the chairman of the committee says there was no deficiency in the appropriation made last year that there was some work which ought to have been done which was neglected on account of the insufficient appropriation. Work was stopped no doubt in order that the Commissioner might be able to say there was no deficiency.

So it will be for the next fiscal year, for the appropriation is not sufficient to meet the needs of the office. I should like to know why it is the appropriation should be cut down $10,000 below the estimates of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. FOSTER. In response to the inquiry of my friend and colleague I have to say that the committee gave this matter particular attention. I gave it considerable attention myself, and without going into details I have to say that in my judgment $30,000 will be an ample sum and that there will be no deficiency at the end of the year.

Mr. VANCE. What was the amount of appropriation last year?

Mr. ATKINS. The amount of appropriation last year was $27,500 and, as I have already stated, there was no deficiency.

Mr. KEIFER. A great deal of work was not brought up because of the smallness of the appropriation; I have been so told by all around me. The Commissioner when he estimated asked, as I understand the chairman of the committee, for $40,000 in order to bring up the work behindhand.

Mr. ATKINS. No, the original estimate made was for $40,000, but that was in view of the restoration of what had been destroyed by the fire; but in view of the very large deficiencies that have passed through this Congress, both at the extra session and at the present session, amounting to over $66,000, nearly $70,000, all these points have been covered, and consequently the $40,000 is not required. There was upon the part of the Commissioner a declaration that there could be a general reduction in these estimates, on account of the large appropriations we have already made by way of deficiencies arising out of the fire in the Patent Office building.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is only one word in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Then I move to strike it all out. I desire to have this matter considered carefully. I have been unable to elicit any reasons from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or from my distinguished colleague on this side of the House why this appropriation should be reduced. We are told on this side it is all right, but we have no answer to the fact that in the estimates the Commissioner says he wants $5,000 more than is provided for. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at the same time wants to cut it down $5,000 more, making a difference between the estimates of the Commissioner and the amount proposed to be appropriated $10,000. I hope the committee will allow it to remain in the bill just as it is. It seems to me the committee had this under consideration, and, desiring to make some reduction from the estimates, they thought they would take off one-eighth, or $5,000, supposing the Commissioner had put on all that was ample. But now, after cutting down $5,000, they come in with an amendment to cut down $5,000 additional.

Mr. ATKINS. I gave the reason why the estimate was so large in the first instance.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not understand it.

Mr. ATKINS. I stated distinctly that it was increased to $40,000 on account of the fire, but that that was remedied by the large amount appropriated in the deficiency bill. There was consequently a reduction in the amount needed in this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. But this was reported since the deficiency bill.

Mr. ATKINS. The Commissioner agreed to cut down his estimates. The amount recommended here is the judgment of the subcommittee composed of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. KEIFER. But the estimates were made since this bill was reported.

Mr. ATKINS. On the contrary, they were made last October.

Mr. KEIFER. I am told now the Committee on Appropriations do not know what the Commissioner of Patents wants for this purpose.

Mr. DURHAM. We do know.

Mr. KEIFER. We are told by the chairman of the committee that he wants $40,000.

Mr. DURHAM. That was the original estimate.

Mr. KEIFER. Now we are told something else. What is the estimate for the appropriation he now desires?

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly not.

Mr. ATKINS. I said the estimate of the Commissioner last October was for $40,000 and that he subsequently was willing to assent to a reduction of his estimate to $35,000. I have not said that at any time the Commissioner was willing to assent to a less sum than $35,000; but I did say that the subcommittee composed of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] and myself had investigated the matter and come to the conclusion that $35,000 was sufficient.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I understand the chairman of the committee to say that the appropriation which the Commissioner of Patents desires now is $35,000?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that very well; and I do not see why it should be less. If we cut it down $5,000, that makes a large reduction from the amount for photolithographing that will be required by the Patent Office in all probability. The result will be that the machinery will stop and the necessary work will not be brought up. I think the men who have paid in advance for this work ought to have it done, and that promptly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] which will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CONGER. Is that amendment offered by the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. ATKINS. It is offered by unanimous consent of the subcommittee.

Mr. CONGER. Is it by order of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ATKINS. I will state to the gentleman frankly that the subject was never brought formally before the Committee on Appropriations as an entirety.

Mr. CONGER. I wish we might have the views of that committee upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to say further to the gentleman that it is offered under the general directions of the committee and with the consent of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Obtained here?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; not obtained here. The amendment has been pending for weeks.

Mr. FOSTER. It has the unanimous approval of the committee.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ATKINS, there were—ayes 71, noes 21.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For photolithographing or otherwise producing copies of the weekly issues of drawings, to be attached to patents and copies, $35,000; the work of said photolithographing or otherwise producing plates and copies, referred to in this and the two preceding paragraphs, to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents, and in the city of Washington if it can be there done at reasonable rates; and the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to make contracts therefor.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1574 strike out the word "reasonable" and insert after the word "rates" the words "the same as elsewhere; those rates to be determined by bids after public advertisement as required by law;" and in line 1576 insert after the word "contracts" the words "after advertising for bids."

Mr. ATKINS. The committee are willing to accept that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the heading "surveyors-general and other clerks:"

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $3,500.

Mr. KIDDER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1610, after the word "Dakota," strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,500."

The surveyors-general of Montana, Utah, and Wyoming receive $2,750. The surveyors-general of New Mexico, Idaho, and Washington receive $2,500 each. The surveyor-general of Dakota receives only $2,000.

Now, in my judgment, if the honorable Committee on Appropriations had known the facts in relation to this matter as I understand them, they would certainly have raised the salary of this surveyor-general at least $500, to make it correspond to the salaries of other surveyors-general. I understand this to be the case: a little more than a year ago the Indian title to the Black Hills, so called, in Dakota Territory, was extinguished, and that country was opened to settlement. Since the discovery of gold and silver there this Territory has become equal in importance to any other Territory in the United States. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has recommended for the current year, in his estimates for surveys in this Territory, more than he has recommended for any other Territory. The duties and responsibilities of the surveyor-general of Dakota have more than doubled since the surveys include mineral lands. Within one year, since June, 1877, more than one hundred applications and orders have been issued for surveying mineral claims. I am satisfied from my own knowledge that these practically will be more than doubled or more than trebled in the next year.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I think that the honorable gentlemen who have charge of this bill will consent to let this amendment be made.

Mr. ATKINS. I have only to state that the committee on this subject and all kindred subjects connected with the surveyors-general have followed the estimates. We have simply followed the estimates and the law of the last session. No one has come to the committee asking for an increase of the salary of the surveyor-general of Dakota. No head of a Department has made either an oral or a written request on that subject. We have simply followed the estimates and followed the law with regard to this particular salary as well, as with regard to all the other salaries of surveyors-general that are included in this bill.

Mr. ITTNER. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. I desire to ask why it becomes necessary to give the surveyor-general in Wyoming Territory $2,750, while the surveyor-general in Dakota Territory only receives $2,000. I would like to hear it explained why this large difference should exist in the salaries of those two officers.

Mr. ATKINS. That was settled some years ago, and was done on account of the increased price of living, as I understand, in the Territory of Wyoming as compared with the Territory of Dakota, and also on account of the very large extent of mineral lands in that Territory.

Mr. DURHAM. The Revised Statutes fix this thing. The gentleman will find that section 2208 reads as follows:

The surveyors-general of Louisiana, Florida, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa, and of Dakota Territory, shall each receive a salary at the rate of $2,000 a year.

I will also read in regard to this subject section 2209 of the Revised Statutes:

The surveyors-general of Oregon and of Washington shall each receive a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year.

And then, in answer to the gentleman, I will read section 2210:

The surveyors-general of Colorado, New Mexico, California, Idaho, Nevada, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, and Arizona shall each receive a salary at the rate of $3,000 a year.

It will be seen from that that the amendment changes existing law, for it increases the salary.

The question was taken on Mr. KIDDER's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For surveyor-general of the State of Colorado, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $3,000.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I move to amend that clause by striking out in line 1614 "$3,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000;" so as to make the appropriation for clerks, $5,000. I understood that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would accede to this amendment. I would call his attention to the fact that the estimate of the Department for the present year, for clerk hire alone, in the surveyor-general's office, in Denver, is $7,200, and the Commissioner has been particular enough in this matter to attach a note to his estimate showing the reasons for asking that amount. That note may be found upon page 47 of the Book of Estimates, and is as follows:

NOTE.—The $7,200 is estimated for the compensation of five clerks and draughtsmen in the surveyor-general's office, to attend to the office work consequent on surveys of public lands and mineral surveys, which latter are sensibly increasing in Colorado, and involve considerable labor in the preparation of the requisite work. Arrears of four years are reported by the surveyor-general, and, from the fact that the appropriation for the current year has been reduced to less than one-half the amount estimated, the present estimate will be actually needed for the service.

And yet I am content, although there is an estimate for $7,200, under these circumstances, to ask simply an appropriation of $5,000 for that work.

If it is the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to oppose the amendment I should like to give to the committee the official statement of the Secretary of the Interior, showing the amount of surveys of public lands that took place in this district during the year 1877. It shows that in the State of Colorado there were 1,581,058 acres of public lands surveyed, being more public lands surveyed in that one land district than in any other of the sixteen, and yet we find that in the State of California $10,000 is allowed for clerk hire. In the State of Minnesota, where not one-third of the amount of public lands were surveyed, $5,000 is allowed, and in the Territory of New Mexico, where less lands were surveyed than in Colorado, $5,000.

Colorado has more public lands and mineral lands to be surveyed to-day than in any other land district and yet the committee propose to allow only $3,000 for clerk hire. I would also state that there is an actual deficiency in the Surveyor-General's Office on account of this large amount of work done last year of $3,000. I think, therefore, that this increase of $2,200 less than was asked for by the Department should be willingly conceded by the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. I would only state in reply that the committee followed the law of last year in regard to the clerical force in this office, just as they did in regard to the other land offices.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I understand the gentleman to state that the guide the committee adopted was the appropriation of last year without any definite information as to the wants of the service in the State that I have the honor to represent.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not admit that, so far as that is concerned. The committee determined when they reached this subject to follow the appropriation of last year, and we were not advised that there was any deficiency in the appropriation for Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I understood in conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that after seeing the statement of the Secretary of the Interior he thought the request was reasonable and that he would hardly oppose it, and I trust he will not do so, because it is absolutely necessary to a fair and proper conduct of the business of that district.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado; and there were ayes 25, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For surveyor-general of California, $2,750; and for the clerks in his office, $10,000.

Mr. PAGE. I move to increase the appropriation for clerks in the office of the surveyor-general of California from $10,000 to $15,000.

Mr. Chairman, after the success of my friend from Colorado in endeavoring to have an amendment sustained, I do not suppose there is much use in my making any attempt. But in justice to the people whom I have the honor in part to represent here, I desire to say that there are to-day over seventy million acres of unsurveyed land in the State of California.

My friend from Colorado said that there were more lands surveyed in the State of Colorado last year than there were in California. That is easily accounted for. If my friend will remember the manner in which the appropriation for this purpose was made last year, it was left to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to distribute the amount, and Colorado got as much again as the State of California. California pays into the Treasury more than all the other States and Territories put together. She paid into the Treasury in 1877 over three quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. DUNNELL. You mean from the sale of public lands.

Mr. PAGE. From cash sales of public lands, and she overbalanced all the other States and Territories combined; and now I ask that an additional appropriation of $5,000 be given to my State for this purpose.

Mr. DUNNELL. Can the gentleman refer——

Mr. PAGE. I will refer the gentleman to the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if that is good enough authority for him. The chief clerk of the surveyor-general of California has not received a dollar for three months; there is no money to pay him. There is a deficiency in that office of between two and three thousand dollars. I have frequently importuned the Committee on Appropriations to insert in a deficiency bill an amount sufficient to pay these officers, and it has not been done.

I would now ask if the committee is willing to cut off the necessary appropriations from the States where they derive such an immense revenue from the sales of public lands? If these lands were surveyed they would be brought into market and the money received for them would go into the Treasury of the United States. The people of California are being arrested for taking timber from the public lands simply because of the niggardly policy of the Appropriations Committee in refusing to make the necessary appropriations for the survey of the public lands in that State. The people of that country are being harassed and arrested simply because of the policy adopted by the Committees on Appropriations by refusing to give to the different States and Territories a sufficient sum to survey the public lands and put them into market.

I hope that the Committee on Appropriations—no, I do not hope it, because I know they will not do it; I have no hope that they will relent at all. I might stand here and talk an hour and recite the evidence showing how the General Government would be benefited and the people of the State of California would be benefited by an increase of appropriation for this purpose, and that money would be paid into the Treasury; and yet that committee would not consent to have their bill altered in the slightest respect.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Will my colleague allow me to ask a question?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Does the gentleman believe that it would facilitate the survey of the public lands to increase the appropriation for the surveyor-general's office in California?

Mr. PAGE. I am surprised that my colleague, [Mr. WIGGINTON,] who represents an agricultural district, should ask me the question if it would facilitate the survey of the public lands in California to make an appropriation for clerks in the surveyor-general's office. I will not answer that question; let him answer it for himself. Under the control of the surveyor-general of California there are by the law of 1872 one hundred and twenty deputy mineral-land surveyors, who have to report to his office and the work has to be done in his office.

Mr. DURHAM. If I were to retort upon the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] when he talks about the niggardly disposition of the Committee on Appropriations by charging that he wants to make a place for some friend of his he would think it very hard, and I will not do it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DURHAM. Just wait a moment.

Mr. PAGE. No, I will not wait.

Mr. DURHAM. I might say that the one is just as proper as the other; but I am not going to make a statement of that sort.

Mr. PAGE. Because you know that it is not true; there is no foundation for it.

Mr. DURHAM. The one is as true as the other.

Mr. PAGE. I did not apply that remark to the present Appropriations Committee more than to any other.

Mr. DURHAM. Why did you not say so?

Mr. PAGE. I referred to the niggardly appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. DURHAM. You have already millions of acres of public lands surveyed in California which have not been taken up; why extend the survey?

Mr. PAGE. That is no reason at all.

Mr. DURHAM. As the gentleman has given up the question I will ask for a vote.

The amendment of Mr. PAGE was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For surveyor-general of Oregon, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $4,500.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I move to amend the paragraph just read by making the appropriation for the clerks in the office of the surveyor-general of Oregon $5,500, instead of $4,500 as reported in this bill.

I probably can hope for no better success than attended the efforts of the gentlemen who have preceded me in asking an increase of appropriation for the transaction of the business of the surveyor-general's office in the State of Oregon. I desire, however, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a note accompanying the estimates shows that the business of that office is in some respects in arrears and has been since 1862.

I desire also to call attention to another fact, that when the Committee on Appropriations were asked here and refused to let the Legislatures of the several Territories remain as they are now organized not a single Delegate from one of those Territories indorsed the action of the committee. And I would state also that not a single Representative from any State where the Committee on Appropriations propose to reduce the amount for the public service in this respect indorses the action of the committee.

I would ask why gentlemen are sent here to represent directly the localities suffering from the neglect of the public service in this respect, if their advice is to be unheeded? In Oregon the public service has suffered since 1862 for the want of sufficient appropriations in this respect, as appears by the note I have called attention to. I do not ask for all that the estimates call for, but simply for an increase of $1,000 for clerks in the office of the surveyor-general of that State.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] replied to the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that there were public lands surveyed in California that had not yet been sold. I say to him that in Oregon the settlements have gone far in advance of the surveys of public lands. I receive every day letters from people who are living upon the public lands and who desire to purchase them, and they cannot do so because they are not yet surveyed.

I have received applications from the surveyor-general's office of Oregon for additional appropriations for his office, in order that he may complete the surveys for those who desire to purchase public lands. I have been compelled to answer him, as other gentlemen have been compelled to reply to similar communications, that an increase of appropriations cannot be obtained for that purpose. I do not stand here to ask any extravagant appropriations or to assail the Committee on Appropriations. I only ask the committee and the House to consider the claims of gentlemen representing these new districts, who ask to have the public service sufficiently and amply performed there. So far as I am aware there is no gentleman upon the Appropriations Committee from any one of these new States or Territories. These sections, then, are so far unrepresented upon that committee. When with one voice the representatives from these sections say that these appropriations ought to be increased their wishes ought to be heeded. This appeal does not come from republicans alone. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] makes the same appeal in the interest of his democratic constituency. I make the appeal in the interest of my constituency in the State of Oregon, without reference to their political feelings, for the efficiency of the public service alone.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for a vote.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Arizona, $2,750; and for the clerks in his office, $4,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move pro forma to amend this paragraph by striking out "three" and inserting "four." I make this motion that I may have an opportunity to reply for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] who in response to the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] stated that in California many thousands of acres of public lands which have been surveyed have not yet been entered. Now, the fact that lands which have been surveyed in a State have not been taken up under the land laws of the country does not show that there should be no extension of surveys. The present Chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. EDEN] objected a few evenings since to a bill which recognized the right of an American citizen to enter upon any unsurveyed portion of the public lands. If we had no surveys at the present time in advance of settlement, where would the two hundred thousand or three hundred thousand people who have gone to the West the present year have found a settlement? They went upon lands that had been surveyed in the years that are past. In my State and in Dakota Territory this year probably one hunded and fifty thousand people have gone in and made settlements, and from one to two million acres of the public lands have been taken up. These settlements could not have been made this year if in prior years the lands had not been surveyed.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is not simply for the interest of the Territories and the frontier States, but it is for the interest of the whole country, that at as early a day as possible the survey of at least the agricultural lands of the entire country should be completed and the surveys made matter of record, so as to facilitate that emigration which must be looked upon at this time as so desirable. It is a hopeful sign that unemployed men are leaving the cities of the East, are leaving New York, Pennsylvania, and the older States, and going out to the West to settle on the prairies or in the Territories. I say it is for the interest of the whole country that our public lands, especially the agricultural lands, should be surveyed as soon as possible.

Mr. ATKINS. Do not the public lands already surveyed embrace many million acres of waste lands which can never be cultivated and can never be of value?

Mr. DUNNELL. That may be the case to a considerable extent.

Mr. ATKINS. Does not the gentleman think there is a necessity for reform in that direction; that we should change our system of surveying the public lands; that we should survey the public lands fit for agriculture and allow the others to remain unsurveyed?

Mr. DUNNELL. I am clearly of the opinion that our agricultural lands should be first surveyed; and I especially object to the survey of portions of the timbered lands of the country. I admit that there should be legislation with regard to our timber lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I desire to state to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] a reason why many portions of our public lands not desirable for settlement are surveyed. In extending the public surveys it is necessary that it be done systematically and that they be connected with the surveys already made and to the general plan as near as possible; hence large sections of the country not valuable or desirable for settlement must be embraced in those surveys. Such lands of course remain unsold; but it is equally true that where lands are desirable for settlement in Oregon, for instance, and in Minnesota I doubt not, the settlements are to-day a long way in advance of the public surveys.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I move to add to the pending paragraph the provision that I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1879, the office of surveyor-general in the States of California, Colorado, Florida, Louisiana, Minnesota, Nebraska, Iowa, Nevada, and Oregon, and also the office of surveyor-general in the Territories of Arizona, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, be, and the same are hereby, abolished, and such of the archives and records then in the offices of said surveyors-general as may not be required for the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be turned over to the governors of the several States and Territories upon the same terms and conditions and in the same manner that the archives have heretofore been delivered to the State authorities in States where the public surveys have been completed and the offices of the surveyors-general closed. That in case no provision has been made by State Legislatures for accepting the surveying archives and records thereof in conformity with section 2218 of the United States Revised Statutes, the completed and unfinished surveys shall be transferred to the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for completion and ultimate delivery to the State authorities.

The furniture, fixtures, and all Government property in the offices of the surveyors-general in the several States and Territories shall be sold under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the proceeds of the same covered into the Treasury of the United States.

That the surveyors of public lands, private land claims, mineral claims, and boundaries between the several States and Territories, military and Indian reservations, and other surveys, when provided for by law, shall be made by competent engineers and surveyors, to be employed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose compensation, as well as that of the personnel of their respective field-parties, shall be as now fixed by law.

Mr. PAGE. I make a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I hope my colleague will not do that. Let the proposition stand on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will state his point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I will do so. The amendment just read evidently changes existing law; and nothing upon the face of the amendment shows that it retrenches expenditures. For the information of the House and the Chair, I send to the desk to be read an extract from the proceedings of the last Congress, when my colleague, [Mr. WIGGINTON,] who now presents this amendment, offered a similar proposition, upon which a point of order was made; and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] decided the point of order well taken.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I only wish to discuss the question. I do not say that it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague admits it is liable to the point of order.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I ask my colleague to withhold his point of order until I can be heard on the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Oh, no; my colleague will have an opportunity to be heard on this question at another time.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If the point of order is withdrawn I renew it. This is not the place on an appropriation bill to discuss the great question of breaking up the public-land system of the United States.

Mr. WIGGINTON. The office of surveyor-general ought to be abolished, as it is entirely useless and the money expended for keeping up that office might be profitably used in the survey of the public lands. The proposition I make is not against the interest of the settler, but on the contrary is in his interest and behalf.

Mr. PAGE. I object to debate.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Let the gentleman withhold his point of order until I can be heard.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I renew it if it is withdrawn.

Mr. WIGGINTON. They are afraid of this proposition. If I am radically wrong why should they be afraid of it? I say it is in the interest of economy and the accurate survey of the public lands.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from California being heard on this proposition?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. This question has been before the Committee on Public Lands and voted down—this very same proposition.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Am I not entitled to five minutes? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from California admits the proposition is liable to the point of order.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I say it is in the interest of economy and the accurate survey of the public lands.

Mr. PAGE. Then I ask the decision of Mr. BUCKNER on this very question be read.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I propose to speak to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman concede it is liable to the point of order?

Mr. WIGGINTON. My proposition is in itself a reduction of expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. WIGGINTON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the Chair will hear the gentleman from California.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I say it is a reduction of expenses. It is in the interest of accurate and speedy survey of the public lands. It is directly in the interest of those who desire to take up the public lands either as settlers, miners, or otherwise. We appropriated last year $ 57,000 and odd to pay the expenses of the offices of these surveyors-general.

Mr. PAGE. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague is not discussing the point of order; but, on the contrary, discussing the merits of the proposition.

Mr. WIGGINTON. We have now claims for deficiencies in this office amounting to several thousand dollars more. This bill appropriates about $100,000 for this purpose. I say, without fear of contradiction, that there is not a gentleman upon this floor who can give any good reason for the further expenses of this office of surveyor-general. The surveyor-general has nothing to do with surveying the public lands. You may appropriate a million dollars to the surveyors-general of the States and Territories, and not one single dollar would be used for public surveys. It is in another place you appropriate money for surveys. Last year this House appropriated $300,000 for surveying public lands and private land claims. In other words, you give to the surveyors-general in the several States and Territories sixty-three cents in order to enable them to expend in actual survey $1. It costs sixty-three cents to the office of the surveyors-general to expend $1 in the field. If this money were appropriated to the survey of the public lands, without the intervention of the surveyors-general in the States and Territories, it would expedite business and be the means of surveying more land.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WIGGINTON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. In speaking about the expenditure of sixty-three cents for every dollar of actual survey made, I ask if that sixty-three cents is not for work that is done in the surveys themselves?

Mr. WIGGINTON. No.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. In defraying the expense of the work, making plats and maps and making copies and sending them to various land districts—for work in fact requisite in making the actual survey?

Mr. WIGGINTON. No, sir; so far as private land claims and mineral lands; the individual applying for the survey pays the expense, and we have nothing to do with it. Contracts are made for the survey of the public lands for agricultural and other purposes, not mineral land, and under those contracts the parties taking them are bound to do the work in the field and return the plats to the surveyor-general's office. When these plats are returned the only service possible that the surveyor-general with all his clerks and this large appropriation can be to the Governmeat is to make three or four copies. He has no original jurisdiction or power in any way. He cannot make a contract for a survey of one single section of land without the concurrence and consent of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He is a hinderance and delay to the surveys of the public lands. It now requires about three months longer to get a survey made by reason of his intervening between the party seeking a survey and the Government. It takes three months longer now than if we had him out of the way. I say there can be but one possible use for him, and that is to continue the great number of Federal offices we have in this Government. There can be no other reason.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that the surveys heretofore made from the city of Washington—the Indian's surveys—have not been jobs, and if there is not a danger that under a centralized system all the surveys of public lands would run into jobs of that character?

Mr. WIGGINTON. I do not know of any of the surveys which have been done lately under the surveyors-general that have not been jobs. I say the true theory is to survey no public lands in advance of settlement. I do not propose the surveys shall be made by men from Washington. There are in California one hundred and twenty deputies now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think the point of order is well taken. If gentlemen will examine the amendment they will see that it does not propose to affect the appropriation in this bureau at all; and not proposing to reduce the expenditure, of course it does not come within the rule.

Mr. ITTNER. I understood the gentleman from California to admit that the point of order was well taken. If that be the case, why should we waste further time in discussing the question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not propose to discuss that question. Only I had to start out with it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California says that no member can give any good reason why the office of surveyor-general should be continued. This office was established in 1820 or 1821; and from then till now or till the last Congress I know of but one movement that has ever been made to abolish it. In 1829 Mr. Foot, then a Senator from one of the New England States, introduced a resolution of inquiry as to whether or not these offices should be abolished. This was in the session of 1829–'30, and his resolution was absolutely rejected. The Senate of the United States would not even inquire into that question. It was so patent to everybody that it was an important office that they would not make the inquiry, but rejected it. From that time till the gentleman from California [Mr. WIGGINTON] came here as a Representative, the policy of this system has never been questioned so far as I remember. I believe that gentleman questioned it in the last session of Congress.

Now, sir, I have not time in five minutes to give the reasons why this office should not be abolished. But if you will examine the amendment you will see it proposes to abolish the office and to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to appoint surveyors, but it fails to confer the power upon him that is conferred upon these surveyors-general.

Mr. PAGE. I do not desire to add anything to what has been already said. But having made the point of order, I will simply say this in reply to my colleague, [Mr. WIGGINTON,] that when this measure shall come into this House in a proper way, as a report of a committee, to abolish the office of surveyor's-general of States and Territories, I shall then consider it my duty to discuss it and give such reasons as may commend themselves to my judgment why I think it ought not to pass. But at present I think it has no business here in this bill, and I respectfully submit the point of order for the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order that has been raised.

In the last House a similar amendment was submitted in the Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman then in the chair ruled that the point of order was well taken. The Chair is of opinion that there may be a very good argument made in favor of the amendment being in the direction of economy; but it was held by Mr. Speaker Kerr in the last House that in order to make the new legislation come within the rule it must be apparent on the face of the amendment that it is in the line of retrenchment.

This amendment abolishes certain offices and provides that the duties now performed by those officers shall be performed under a different system which is to supersede the present system. But there is nothing in the amendment from which the Chair can determine what the new arrangement would cost. Hence the Chair cannot say on the face of the amendment that it is in the line of retrenchment, and therefore he feels compelled to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

That public lands situated in States in which there are no land offices may be entered at the General Land Office, subject to the provisions of law touching the entry of public lands; and that the necessary proofs and affidavits required in such cases may be made before some officer competent to administer oaths, whose official character shall be duly certified by the clerk of a court of record. And moneys received by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for lands entered by cash entry shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to hear some explanation of this from the chairman of the committee. This seems to be new legislation.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; it was in the last appropriation act.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It seems to be all right.

Mr. PAGE. Very well.

Mr. CORLETT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "lands," in line 1651, and inserting the following:

And that the necessary proofs and affidavits required in all cases under the homestead and pre-emption laws may be made before any officer competent to administer oaths under the law of the State or Territory where the applicant resides: Provided, That the official character of the officer taking such proofs or affidavits shall be duly certified by the clerk of a court of record and the moneys received by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for lands entered by cash entry shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. CORLETT. I desire to say a few words in explanation of this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I see no objection to it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire as a modification of the amendment that after the word "pre-emption" there should be inserted "timber-culture." It should read "homestead, pre-emption, and timber-culture laws."

Mr. CORLETT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is proper that that modification should be made.

Mr. CORLETT. I will accept the modification.

The question was put upon Mr. CORLETT'S amendment; and the Chairman announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if his amendment applies to all the States?

Mr. CORLETT. It applies to all the cases that occur in the States or Territories.

Mr. ATKINS. Does it apply to those States where there are no land offices?

Mr. CORLETT. It applies to all, because there is no reason why a man should be required to go to a land office in a case of this kind or come to Washington when his case is referred here.

The object of the amendment is simply to permit the party to make the affidavits required to be made under the homestead, pre-emption, and timber-culture law before any person competent to administer the oath, and then have the official character of that officer certified to by the clerk of a court of record. Section 2294 of the Revised Statutes provides that this may be done in homestead cases, and the object of the amendment is to permit it to be done in all cases.

Mr. DUNNELL. There is some misunderstanding in regard to the amendment. I had supposed that it was intended to apply to the first portion of the provision in the bill, but the gentleman speaks of it now as being applicable to all the States and Territories.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Is there any reason why it should not?

Mr. CORLETT. The very object is to apply it to all cases. There ought to be a general law on the subject. There is no reason why a man should be required to go one hundred and fifty miles to swear to an affidavit. He may just as well do it before any officer authorized to administer oaths, and then have the official character of that officer certified to by the clerk of a court of record.

As gentlemen do not seem clearly to understand the purpose of my amendment I will be more explicit in stating my purpose, a statement I would have gladly made before the question was taken on the amendment, if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had not accepted it before I had any opportunity of doing so.

It is well understood by those who are at all acquainted with the subject that the lands sought to be taken up under the homestead and pre-emption laws may be, and often are, situated at remote distances from the local land office of the district wherein the lands are situated. If parties settling upon the public lands and desiring to obtain title thereto from the United States are to be required to visit the land office every time they are required to make an affidavit, made necessary by the law as a part of the procedure under which title is obtained, then the beneficent features of these laws, made in the interest of settlers upon the public domain, will be in part at least destroyed. I will give an instance to illustrate how the present state of the law operates. In the Territory of Wyoming there is a large and prosperous agricultural settlement in what is known as the Wind River Valley. These people are all about two hundred and fifty miles from the local land office, and cannot, as I believe, make a single trip to the land office and return at an expense short of $75. Under the present state of the law these people may make the affidavits required in homestead applications before the clerk of a court of record; but unfortunately they have to travel one hundred and fifty miles to get to such an officer. Some of these people who have experienced the operation of the present law have appealed to me to know if they cannot be relieved from the unnecessary burden of the law as it now stands. I know of no way in which the difficulty can be obviated except by some such legislation as is embraced in my amendment. The homestead and pre-emption laws were enacted for the benefit of poor men and women. Hence in all their features they should be so framed as to enable these people for whom they were designed to avail themselves of their benefits, and not "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope." I therefore hope no objection will be made to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has announced that the amendment was adopted, and this debate is not in order. Does the gentleman from Tennessee ask for a further count?

Mr. ATKINS. I do.

Mr. HANNA. Do I understand that the Committee on Appropriations object to this amendment?

Mr. DURHAM. We do; because we do not understand it.

Mr. HANNA. Then for God's sake let us sit down until you do understand it, for it will be a saving of thousands of dollars to the people.

Mr. ATKINS. I thought there was a misunderstanding as to the application of the gentleman's amendment to the paragraph. I thought it was intended to apply to the States where there are no land offices, but he says he proposes to apply it to all the States.

Mr. HANNA. Let me give you a case by way of suggestion.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no feeling about the matter.

Mr. HANNA. I know that; but I am satisfied that if it was understood there would be no objection to the amendment. Suppose a man in one of the Territories——

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is all out of order.

Mr. HANNA. It seems to me that we ought to have an opportunity in this House to have matters sufficiently explained to vote intelligently upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is bound to enforce the rules of the House.

Mr. HANNA. I call for the reading of the section as it is proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read the paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw my demand for a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. No further count being demanded, the amendment is agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For compensation of the Postmaster-General, $8,000; chief clerk to the Postmaster-General, $2,200; stenograper, $1,500; appointment clerk of class 4, in lieu of a fourth-class clerk now provided for; one clerk of class 3 (office of Assistant Attorney-General for Post-Office Department;) one messenger (clerk of class 1,) $1,200; one assistant messenger; topographer, $2,500; temporary employés, $15,000; in all, $34,520.

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment:

In line 1664 strike out "three" and insert "four;" so that it will read:

One clerk of class 4, (office of the Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.)

And in line 1669 strike out "five" and insert "seven;" so as to make the total $4,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I move, in line 1663 and 1664, to strike out the words "of class 3" and to add after the word "Department," in line 1665, the words "two thousand;" so that it will read:

One clerk, (office of the Assistant Attorney-General Post-Office Department,) $2,000.

I have great deference for the gentlemen composing the Committee on Appropriations, and appreciate their industry and care in the preparation of this bill, but I must insist upon this amendment because the salary provided for in the bill is not at all what this clerk ought to receive. He must be a lawyer and a good lawyer, and we have the anomalous fact that he has a clerk under him at $1,800 and two others at $1,600 each.

The character of work demanded of him is such that it is absolutely necessary to have not only a good lawyer but a man of fine common sense, of great industry, and great energy. At present the place is filled by a gentleman who has commended himself highly to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads by the attention he has given us and the industry he has shown in supplying us with information. To this office has to be submitted decisions in relation to postmasters all over the country. Heretofore the decisions in regard to the pay of postmasters have been illogical and conflicting. Questions must come from various parts of the country and it is necessary that there should be in this place a man who understands the law on the subject and who will give to the questions great care and attention.

Mr. ATKINS. What business has the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department to do except to supply information of that sort? The bill contains an appropriation for a sixteen-hundred-dollar clerk, and the Committee on Appropriations have agreed to give an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk. Now the gentleman wants to magnify the office still more and give to this clerk $2,000.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I will answer the gentleman if he will allow me.

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. The office of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department is a very important one. In a letter which was sent to the Speaker——

Mr. ATKINS. I thought the gentleman was going to ask a question, not to make a speech.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. In a letter which was sent to the Speaker of this House by the Postmaster-General it was stated that during the last year over a thousand cases had been decided by the Assistant Attorney-General for this Department. This office, this clerk, is intended to be an assistant to the Assistant Attorney-General. He must be a laborious and intelligent officer, a good lawyer; such a one as they have there at present. It occurs to me that $2,000 is not an exorbitant salary for such an office.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not believe that ten or twelve years ago there was a single Assistant Attorney-General of the United States. Now we have three regular Assistant Attorneys-General, and here is another assistant, and the gentleman proposes to give an assistant to this Assistant Attorney-General.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, that is the substance of it; to make another assistant, an assistant to the Assistant Attorney-General in the Post-Office Department, at a salary of $2,000 a year. The estimate for this clerk was $1,600; but the Committee on Appropriations were importuned so much on the subject, (I do not refer to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads, but to others,) were asked to increase the salary, and we have increased it to $1,800. Now the gentleman proposes to increase it to $2,000. I leave that question to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the provision of this bill under the head of "General Land Office," in line 1449 of the bill, "law clerk, $2,000." There they provide $2,000 for an officer to discharge identically the same duties that this clerk has to perform. Then in line 1874 I find this: "One law clerk, $2,000." That is for the office of the Attorney-General, a clerk to discharge the same duties that this clerk discharges. Now, why not allow the clerk in the office of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department the same compensation that is allowed to similar clerks in other Departments?

Mr. DURHAM. I will not answer that. The Department did not ask for such a clerk, only for a $1,600 clerk, and we have given the Department an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk. Certainly the Department knows how to appreciate the services of such a clerk, and they only ask for $1,600 for him.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. MONEY; and upon a division there were—ayes 14, noes 61.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; two clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; superintendent of blank agency, $1,800; assistant superintendent of blank agency, $1,600; four assistants to superintendent of blank agency, at $1,200 each; two assistants to superintendent of blank agency, at $900 each; one assistant messenger; two pages, at $480 each, (for blank agency;) superintendent of free delivery, $2,100; one clerk of class two, (office of superintendent of free delivery;) in all, $65,400.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to provide for five assistants instead of four assistants to superintendent of blank agency. I move this amendment for the reason that the business of that office is constantly increasing. The same force which the Committee on Appropriations now provide for was in this office in 1868, when there were in operation in the United States 26,481 post-offices; while on the 1st day of March last the number of post-offices was 38,286, an increase of 10,805. It must be evident to every one that the present force is entirely inadequate.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say that I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. It is too late for the gentleman to reserve a point of order after I have discussed the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing that the gentleman should keep on with his argument, but I want to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is too late.

Mr. MILLS. The force now employed in the office of the superintendent of blanks is entirely inadequate to perform the work required of distributing blanks to all the post-offices in the country. In a letter to me the superintendent of the blank agency says:

> No increase of this force has been made until the present time, when it is proposed to add one messenger and two pages. To such an extent has the work increased that the clerks are compelled to work nights and Sundays, and for several weeks at the beginning of each quarter, and even with this extra work they are frequently eight or ten days in arrears. In October last the stationery division, which includes also the entire transactions of the Department with the Government Printing Office, was transferred to the control of the superintendent of the blank agency. The clerk who has been in charge of this work was assigned to other duties, and one of the assistants of the blank agency was detailed to the work.

So that we find that the work is constantly increasing in this bureau of the Post-Office Department because of the increase of post-offices in the country; and yet the force now is the same that it was in 1868, although we have eleven thousand more post-offices to-day than there was at that time, and the ratio of increase of post-offices is five hundred per annum.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is just economy. In fact I do not entirely comprehend the statesmanship of that sort of economy which continually cuts down the capacity of the Departments to attend to their work, but never looks to the reduction of taxation to be taken from the pockets of the people. My idea of proper economy is that which relieves the burden of taxation. The statesmanship of the leaders of the democratic party in this House has never yet gone far enough to relieve the taxation of the people; it takes the same number of dollars from their pockets year by year and only stickles about how the money is to be expended. It cuts down the machinery of the Government and gives money to Paris expositions, Philadelphia shows, and other propositions of that kind that come here commending themselves to our admiration.

Mr. ATKINS. The Committee on Appropriations in this case followed the estimate, there being only four assistants estimated for. I will state further that the statute provides for four assistants at a salary of $1,200 each.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of inspection and equipment, $2,000; seven clerks of class 4; twenty-two clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; one page, $480; in all, $92,700.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out "six" in line 1692 and inserting "five;" so as to provide for "five clerks at $1,000 each." I also move to amend by making the total of the paragraph "$91,700."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief of division of dead letters, $2,250; chief of division of postage-stamps, $2,250; four clerks of class 4; twelve clerks of class 3; twenty clerks of class 2; twenty-five clerks of class 1; sixteen clerks, at $1,000 each; fifty-four female clerks, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; one page, $480; for laborers, $3,000; three female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $163,360.

Mr. BUNDY. I move to amend by striking out in line 1702 the word "sixteen" and inserting "twenty-two;" so as to provide for twenty-two clerks at $1,000 each. Upon one proposition I suppose members of the Committee of the Whole will all be united; that is, to make such appropriations and provisions in this bill as shall best secure faithful postal service throughout the country. While it may not be well for us in the present condition of the country to be liberal, we cannot afford to be illiberal in providing for a service in which every man, woman, and child in the land is so directly interested. I feel justified in saying that in the judgment of the people the postal service stands second only to that of the Treasury Department.

I do not question that the Committee on Appropriations, in preparing this bill, have been diligent in the effort to ascertain the necessities of the postal service. While I do not doubt their diligence and efficiency, I have taken occasion to make careful inquiry of those who are so situated in the Post-Office Department as to afford to us reliable information, and I learn from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General that the clerks needed in his department in addition to those provided for in this bill are two in the division of finance, five in the division of postage-stamps, two in the dead-letter division, and two in the division of registered letters. My amendment proposes to authorize but six additional clerks, at $1,000 each—not conforming fully to the request of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. I offer this amendment, believing that, while it is a compromise compared with the number asked for, it is really in the interest of the postal service.

I hold in my hand a statement which I desire to have incorporated in my remarks showing the percentage of increase or decrease on various items of the postal service for the years 1860, 1865, 1870, 1875, and 1877. This statement shows an increase of over 220 per cent. in the revenues of the Department, and an increase of only 125 per cent. in its expenditures, thus supporting my proposition that we can afford to be liberal toward a Department which approximates in many respects to a self-supporting basis.

It will be remembered that during the period covered by this statement there has been inaugurated the money-order system, which the statistics show to be nearly self-sustaining. It is true that the clerical force in the Post-Office Department has been very largely increased; but this statement shows that the increase of revenue is nearly 100 per cent. in advance of the increase of clerical force.

This statement, I think, will prove valuable for future examination. I trust that the amendment will prevail.

The statement referred to by Mr. BUNDY is as follows:

‖ Act authorizing postal cards, approved January 8, 1873.

Mr. DIBRELL. As an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BUNDY] I offer the following:

In line 1700 strike out "twelve" and insert "fifteen;" in line 1701, after the word "twenty," insert "four;" in the same line strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-three;" in lines 1702 and 1703 strike out "sixteen clerks, at $1,000 each;" so that, if amended, the clause will read: "fifteen clerks of class 3; twenty-four clerks of class 2; thirty-three clerks of class 1."

This amendment leaves the number of clerks in that Department just as at present. The bill proposes to dispense with fifteen clerks of class 1 and to allow sixteen clerks at $1,000 each. The amendment leaves the number and salaries of these clerks just as they are now. It is known to everybody that the first-class clerks do as much work as those of the fourth class and receive but $1,200. The Committee on Appropriations propose to reduce the compensation to $1,000.

Mr. ATKINS. In this bill we have given the postal service an increase of eighteen employés. The present law is three hundred and twenty-seven, while this bill proposes to give them three hundred and forty-five. I do not know how much the amendment of my colleague will swell the general aggregate.

Mr. DIBRELL. Four thousand dollars only and to the amount only allowed by the last Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. It disturbs the classification we have made for the several bureaus in the Department—First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters-General. My opinion is we have given ample force with the amendments the committee intend to offer. I hold in my hand two amendments I shall offer at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on Mr. DIBRELL's amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Does this increase the number of clerks the necessity for which was indicated by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DIBRELL. I did not hear the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I was not in when it was read.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The amendment of the gentleman from New York increases the number of clerks from sixteen to twenty-two. Now, does the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee meet the necessity indicated by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DIBRELL. I think it does. My amendment proposes to leave the number at what it now is. The bill proposes to reduce that number sixteen and to make sixteen new clerks at $1,000. I propose to leave the number at the present salaries of twelve, fourteen, and sixteen hundred dollars.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then your amendment only changes the salaries, and not the number of clerks.

Mr. DIBRELL. That is all.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then I shall favor the amendment of the gentleman from New York, for the reasons he has given.

Mr. BUNDY. I understand the necessity in this case is an increase of the clerical force.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BUNDY. Then I move to strike out the last word. I understand the necessity is to increase the clerical force. I do not understand the reasoning of the gentleman from Tennessee that by promoting a clerk from a third to a second class he would be able to peform any more labor. He admits it increases the appropriation $4,000 while the amendment offered by myself proposes to increase the appropriation $6,000, but at the same time gives to the Department six additional clerks. The necessity for additional clerks is the increase of business in the Post-Office Department. I withdraw my amendment until a vote can be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ATKINS. The entire clerical force was heretofore provided under one head; in this bill we have spread it under six different heads.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from New York has not yet concluded his remarks.

Mr. ATKINS. I beg pardon; I thought he had finished.

Mr. BUNDY. I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, that I have letters from the Post-Office Department which are reliable, coming from reliable sources, that on account of the lack of clerical force many have been required during the past few months, because of the increased number of new post-offices, because of the increased applications for money-order offices, and I know gentlemen present will bear me out that their experience is the same as my own, that applications are coming in every day seeking the interposition of members of Congress to aid them in securing money-order offices—I learn, I say, that in consequence of this greatly increased business many of these clerks are required to work, not only over hours, but in some instances during the entire night. Hence, my position is that the Department needs more help but not higher-priced help.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Do you know the Post-Office Department desires this increase?

Mr. BUNDY. I do know it. I know that the Postmaster-General does desire an increase of this clerical force.

Mr. ATKINS. I was proceeding to say that heretofore we have appropriated under one head and provided for the payment of clerical force under another head. In this bill we have spread the whole matter out and they are provided for under six different heads: First Assistant, Second Assistant, Third Assistant Postmasters-General, then money-order office, foreign office, and mail depredations, making six heads under which the clerical force is divided. We have given eighteen additional employés over and above those provided for in the present appropriation. It seems to us it is enough. I hold in my hand two amendments which the committee authorized me to offer at the proper time increasing the force two more.

The question recurred on Mr. BUNDY's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 77.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1697, after the word "dollars," insert "chief clerk, $2,000," and in line 1707 strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the total correspond.

I simply desire to state to the committee that the effect of the amendment is to restore that position.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1701 strike out "five" and insert "four," making it read "twenty-four clerks of class 1."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DIBRELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1700 strike out "twelve" and insert "fifteen;" in line 1701, after the word "twenty," insert "four;" in line 1701 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-three;" in lines 1702 and 1703 strike out "sixteen clerks at $1,000 each;"

so that it will read: "Fifteen clerks of class 3, twenty-four clerks of class 2, thirty-three clerks of class 1."

Mr. DIBRELL. This amendment leaves the number of clerks in the Department just the same as it is now and at the same salaries as they now draw. The committee propose to reduce the number to sixteen and to substitute one-thousand-dollar clerks in their place.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to state to the committee that if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] is adopted it will give this branch of the Department an advantage over every other. We have regulated the clerical force in every Department, commencing with the State Department, in the same way as we have regulated it here, and if the amendment of the gentleman is adopted then you destroy that harmony which will exist in all the Departments by reducing the higher grades and putting in the clerks at $1,000. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment for that reason, and for the additional reason that it increases the amount between $3,000 and $4,000. We have already given in this Department twenty and more additional clerks.

Mr. DIBRELL. Not in this division.

Mr. ATKINS. We have in the Post-Office Department, and we think we have given an ample number of clerks here.

The question being taken on Mr. DIBRELL's amendment, there were—ayes 62, noes 46.

Mr. DURHAM. A quorum has not voted, and I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DIBRELL and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 62.

Mr. DURHAM. I will ask for a vote in the House on this amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For superintendent of foreign mails, $3,000; chief clerk, $1,800; one clerk of class 4; two clerks of class 3; two clerks of class two; one assistant messenger; in all, $13,320.

Mr. AIKEN. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1712, after the words "class 2," insert "one clerk at $1,000."

This is not new legislation, and I hold it is entirely in the line of economy. I hope, therefore, that the Committee on Appropriations will not antagonize it. I have made a special investigation into this matter and I find that clerk has been employed ever since June, 1874, that is, for four consecutive years. He has been employed during that time at that salary doing that work; and yet there has been no appropriation made for him. That clerk has been on the roll known as the roll of temporary clerks, and this amendment, if adopted, will simply take him off the roll of temporary clerks and put him on the regular roll. For that reason I have offered the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I will only say this is not estimated for in the Book of Estimates.

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on Mr. STEELE's motion, there were ayes 16, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For chief of division of mail depredations, $2,000; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; two clerks of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000, office of disbursing clerk and superintendent of building: disbursing clerk and superintendent, $2,100; one clerk of class 2, (accountant;) one clerk of class 1, (storekeeper;) engineer, $1,400; one assistant engineer, $900; one fireman, who shall be a blacksmith, $900; one fireman, who shall be a steam-fitter, $900; one fireman, $720; one carpenter, $1,200; one assistant carpenter, $1,000; captain of the watch, $1,000; for watchmen, $9,000; and for laborers, $15,000; in all $45,120.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph, but before I do so I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if he has any amendment to offer to it?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the following words after dollars in line 1722 to the word "office" in line 1724, namely: "One clerk of class 3, one clerk of class 2, two clerks of class 1, one clerk at $1,000," and insert in lieu thereof "one clerk of class 4, one clerk of class 3, one clerk of class 2, and two clerks of class 1."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The difference between the original bill and the amendment in amount is $800.

The Postmaster-General, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I have been furnished a copy, has better stated this case than I can state it. I therefore content myself with sending the letter to the desk to be read, and will then let the committee dispose of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 30, 1878.

SIR: Permit me to invite the attention of your honorable committee to certain provisions of House bill 4104, "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879," namely, page 71, lines 1722, 1723, and 1724, stipulating for, "One clerk of class 3, one clerk of class 2, two clerks of class 1, and one clerk at $1,000;" and to ask the committee to alter the terms of said section so as to read: "One clerk of class 4, one clerk of class 3, one clerk of class 2, and two clerks of class 1."

This request is made with a view of providing for the proper advancement of the clerical force whose familiarity with the special details of the division of mail depredations renders their services of the highest importance to the Department and the public.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The date of the letter is April 30, 1878.

Mr. ATKINS. It was written only two or three days ago. I will simply state that the Committee on Appropriations did not provide in this bill for one clerk of class 4 in the office of mail depredations because no such clerk is estimated for. If the honorable Postmaster-General had wanted a clerk of class 4 he ought to have said so to the committee; but he did not do it. It is only when the bill is being considered that he writes this letter, and I have not had time to read letters from the Department during the progress of the bill through the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not finding fault with the Committee on Appropriations. I agree with the gentleman that the estimate ought to have been made. But as is appears that it is desired to have this change made increasing the appropriation by $800, I thought it well enough to offer the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope it will not be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois; there were—ayes 58, noes 67.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. A quorum has not voted. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DURHAM, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 80.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. As there seems to be a general desire to stop at this point, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. POTTER. Oh, no; let us finish the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Go on! Go on!

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; I am quite willing. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken on Mr. WHITE's motion, and the committee refused to rise.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Post-Office Department:
For stationery, $9,000; fuel for the General Post-Office building, including the Auditor's Office, $7,400; for gas, $5,000; plumbing and gas-fixtures, $4,000; telegraphing, $3,000; painting, $7,000; carpets, $5,000; furniture, $5,000; keeping of horses and repair of wagons and harness, $1,200; hardware, $1,500; and for rent of house numbered 915 E street, northwest, $1,500; and for miscellaneous items, $6,000; and for publication of copies of the Official Postal Guide, $15,000; in all, $70,600.

Mr. ATKINS. In line 1755 I move to strike out "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000;" so as to increase the appropriation for the Official Postal Guide $5,000. The committee was satisfied that an additional appropriation of $5,000 was necessary for a publication of this kind, and therefore they instructed me to offer the amendment.

The question was put upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. In line 1745 I move to strike out "seven" and insert "four" in lieu thereof; so that it will read: "Fuel for the Post-Office Department building, including the Auditor's Office, $4,400."

I will state by way of explanation that I have been recently engaged in an investigation of the expenditures of this fund, and I learned that from the improved manner of heating the Post-Office Department building the expense of fuel does not exceed $3,500. The disbursing officer said to me himself that the estimate they had made was too large, and therefore I propose to reduce it to what I believe to be a sufficient amount.

Mr. ATKINS. In justice to the Committee on Appropriations, it should be stated that the appropriation as put in the bill is nearly $3,000 below the estimate. The estimate was $9,000, and then an additional estimate of $1,000 was sent in, making $10,000, and we give them $7,400.

Mr. BURCHARD. It has been a very mild winter, you know.

Mr. FOSTER. Did we not have the officers of the Post-Office Department before us on this subject?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. I will state that Mr. Burnside himself, who handles this money and pays it out, made the statement that the amount in the bill is largely in excess of what is necessary.

The question was put upon Mr. CALDWELL's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. I now move to add to the paragraph what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Post-Office Department shall be expended as specially directed in the bill and according to appropriation for the items specifically named, and that no moneys appropriated for a specific purpose named, under the head "for contingent expenses of the Post-Office Department," shall be diverted from one purpose to another, and that all moneys unexpended for one or more specific purposes shall be turned into the Treasury and not expended by the superintendent and disbursing officer for any object or purpose whatsoever other than the specific ones named in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. I will state, by way of explanation, that it has been the custom of the Post-Office Department in handling this fund, which is specifically appropriated for various purposes, to divert from one purpose to another money specifically appropriated by Congress. In the investigation Mr. Burnside, who handles the money, said that it had been the custom for a number of years, but he did not approve of it himself. I propose by this amendment to provide that when an appropriation is made for a particular purpose it shall be applied to that purpose, and if not so applied it shall be turned into the Treasury.

Mr. HANNA. As I understand it, the existing law now is that when appropriations are made for one purpose they must be expended for that purpose. Now, I do not understand the object of this amendment. Here is a long amendment thrust in our faces without an opportunity of our understanding it, and I want to know what its object is.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state the object. I am thoroughly advised of the fact that it is the duty of the officers of the Government, when money has been appropriated for a particular purpose, to apply it to that purpose; but in this Department, the only Department under the Government that I know of where the custom prevails, this rule has not been pursued. I am not censuring the disbursing officer who controls the expenditure of this money. He found it the custom when he entered the Department and has followed it up. All the officers of the Department think the custom a bad one and that it ought to be broken up, and that is what my amendment proposes.

Mr. HANNA. But if this is already the existing law, what will be gained by re-enacting it?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. This is a specific instruction to the disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department that he must not violate the law.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the gentleman to state that the various items in the appropriation for the contingent fund only have been used one for another. This is an appropriation for contingencies in which we name a number of items. Now, under the head of contingencies they have transferred the appropriation from one item to another, as, for instance, if the appropriation for fuel is too large they may use the balance of it for carpets, or for some other purpose.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. The custom in regard to this matter has been this: for instance, $9,000 is appropriated for gas, $10,000 for paper, and appropriations made for different objects of that sort, all under the general head of "contingencies." In the expenditure of these appropriations they have not regarded the specific purposes for which they were made, but if any balance is left of any one appropriation it has been expended for some miscellaneous item.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that this amendment is out of order if it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. CONGER. If it does not change existing law, then it is unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment having been entertained and discussed, the point of order comes too late.

The amendment of Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, was then agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I desire to inquire of my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. ATKINS,] if there is any provision made here for a library for the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. ATKINS. There is not.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Then I move to add to the paragraph the words, "and $500 for books for the library of the Assistant Attorney General."

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to this paragraph; this paragraph does not relate to the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is manifest that we cannot finish this bill to-night, and I therefore move that the committee now rise.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope not; let us get through with the portion of the bill relating to the Post-Office Department; it will take but a few minutes longer.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. This paragraph provides for the publication of the Official Postal Guide, and appropriates $15,000 for the purpose. The amendment which I have offered is for a library for the Post-Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any part of the paragraph under consideration which makes an appropriation for a library of the Post-Office Department, or is there any law establishing a library?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I would like to have read by the Clerk a communication from the Post-Office Department on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot consent to an argument on the merits of the amendment pending the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. You have a law officer there who is called upon to determine important questions without any library and without any books for reference.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be very important that there should be a library, but if there is no law authorizing one the amendment must necessarily be excluded on the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and began the reading of the paragraph in relation to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ATKINS moved that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ERRETT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence until Tuesday next on account of important business.

LAWS OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the secretary of Washington Territory, forwarding for the use of Congress, in pursuance of section 1844 of the Revised Statutes, two copies of the session laws of said Territory; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 3987) to regulate the advertising of mail lettings, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate T. W. FERRY, ALGERNON S. PADDOCK, and ELI SAULSBURY.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' REUNION, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., at the national soldiers and sailors' reunion to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMBOAT ROBERT HARRIS.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4676) to change the name of the steamboat Robert Harris to that of Belle of Redwing; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent that there be a session of the House on Tuesday evening next for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. PAGE. Is there not a session for to-night?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. PAGE. For what purpose?

The SPEAKER. For debate only.

Mr. PAGE. Then I object.

Mr. BURCHARD. I think we had better not assign our evenings so far ahead for such purposes; we may want them for business.

The SPEAKER. There is objection, and the request is not granted.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS ON GOVERNMENT WORKS.

Mr. BOUCK. The bill (H. R. No. 4327) for the relief of certain persons employed upon the Government works was referred by mistake to the Committee of Claims. I ask consent that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which has the subject under consideration.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion for a recess. The Chair will state that the session for this evening is for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DAVIS, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven and a half o'clock p. m. and was called to order by Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As announced when the House took its recess this evening, the session of to-night is for debate only.

TARIFF.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration for the revision of our custom laws is an attack upon the industries of our country that are now most prostrated. As has been heretofore said, since this bill has been under discussion, the people have not asked for such a measure; the agricultural interests of the country that the chairman of the committee and other gentlemen claim to be largely interested in the passage of this measure, have not asked of the committee or of Congress any such bill; and the farmers of the North, as they look out over the prostrated manufacturing, mining, and mechanical industries, have no desire and are not clamoring for the passage of a measure that will still further prostrate them.

The chairman of the committee in his address upon the introduction of his bill does not base this measure of "revenue reform" upon the ground usually assumed by those who advocate "a tariff for revenue only." It is not claimed by him that his bill will raise a greater amount of revenue than the existing custom laws. In his speech he informs the committee and the country "that we are raising $40,000,000 of revenue in excess of the actual needs of the Government," and that by strict economy and by the suspension of the operations of the sinking-fund law we could dispense with this large amount of revenue. I shall not discuss the policy of suspending the law requiring the purchase of "1 percentum of the entire debt of the United States to be made with each fiscal year, and which is to be set aside as a sinking fund," but content myself with saying I am opposed to such legislation.

The chairman of the committee, as an excuse for his bill, among other things, says that "it will lead to a larger interchange of commodities between other nations and ourselves in which we will be the gainers."

Now, sir, as to this proposition of the honorable chairman of the committee, I do not concede that by a larger interchange of commodities between the people of the United States and the people of other nations we are to be necessarily the gainers. On the other hand, I think it has been demonstrated in the past that in such exchange we are naturally and necessarily the losers. Great Britain imports annually, for the purposes of manufacturing, raw material to the amount in round figures of $700,000,000 annually, while the United States imports less than $70,000,000 annually of raw material for the use of her manufactures. Great Britain imports annually $800,000,000 of breadstuffs to feed the operatives engaged in her various industries. She manufactures and exports of manufactured goods more than twelve hundred million dollars' worth annually. The British as well as other European manufacturers have cheaper labor than we can possibly expect to obtain in this country for many years to come, and cheaper labor than any one interested in the welfare of our people ever desire to see. European countries in a long series of years have gathered together into few hands vast amounts of capital to be used in manufacturing industries; people of these countries work for lower wages than ours can be induced to work for, and this cheap labor is the capital upon which the foreign manufacturer is enabled to import raw material, work it up at a profit, export it, and sell it in other countries. Capital in European countries is cheaper than in the United States and labor much cheaper.

I do not see the advantage we are to gain in this country by taking our raw material from the interior of the country to the seaboard, shipping it abroad, there having it manufactured by the cheap labor of other countries, and returned to us in the various forms of the manufactured article. Take, for instance, iron, manufactured largely in Great Britain and in this country, and a ton of bar-iron in the warehouse at Pittsburgh is worth $40; $35 of this goes to pay the labor required in producing it. Beginning with the miner in the ore-beds around Lake Superior, with those who handle the iron from time to time till it reaches the coal-fields in the Ohio Valley; the coal miner, the men who quarry the limestone and bring the material together at the furnaces, those who handle the pig-iron, the skilled labor required in the manufacture of the iron, and they receive seven-eighths of the cost of the iron when ready for market. The labor of the same class of men in Great Britain is 50 per cent. cheaper than it is in the United States. Any one can see that with this great disparity in the price of labor we cannot manufacture in the United States unless those who engage in it are protected against the cheap labor and cheaper capital of the European countries. But I do not desire at any length to discuss this question of the labor that enters into the production of our various manufactured articles; this phase of the protective system has been discussed in this country for half a century, every one thoroughly understands it, and will understand that a reduction of the tariff means a reduction of wages and a transfer of the business of manufacturing to European countries.

It may be said here, and will be claimed, that there is in this bill no such reduction as will interfere to any great extent with these industries. The trouble with the bill is that it is a threat made directly against the very industries of the country that are at this time most prostrated, a threat against the industries over which has been hanging for the last five years a cloud of despondency.

The chairman in discussing his bill admits frankly that if he had the power to commence de novo "I should reduce the duties 50 per cent. instead of 15 per cent. on the average as now proposed." The honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW,] whose remarks appear in the RECORD, page 2798, says:

> The tariff bill now before Congress, in my judgment, while in many respects is better than the present law, and I may vote for some of its provisions if no better are offered, is not what it should be, and before it reaches any degree of excellence must be shorn of many of its imperfections.
> It does not conform, as a whole, to the average percentage of customs duties which prevailed under the Walker tariff of 23½ per cent.

The honorable gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] whose remarks also appear in the RECORD, page 2791, in speaking of our present revenue laws declares that "our commerce is in fetters, and our working people are enslaved by cunningly devised revenue laws to merciless and grinding monopolies." These remarks undoubtedly contain the animus of those who desire a change in the tariff laws. We are again to fight the battle between protection and "revenue reform," as it is now denominated, that was fought half a century ago when Henry Clay made his famous defense of the American system, and there has been since that time an unceasing warfare between the two schools in this country, and those who are now engaged in manufacturing are notified that the warfare has been again commenced.

This question, as I have already remarked, is one that affects labor. The gentleman from Texas, when he speaks of "merciless and grinding monopolies," seems to regard those who are engaged in the mining, manufacturing, and kindred industries of the country as being at enmity to those who are engaged in agriculture and kindred pursuits. We would gather from his remarks that those who have seen fit to embark their capital in these enterprises have been successful, that they have accumulated large fortunes, that they are living off the life-blood of the people. I appeal to the condition of the country for the truth of what I here assert; that of all investments of capital that have been made in the last sixteen years, none have brought ruin to so many as those investing in the very industries he attacked in his speech.

I represent a district composed largely of agriculturists, (farmers,) but having a border on the Ohio River of towns and cities engaged in iron, glass, pottery, terra-cotta, and other pursuits of a kindred nature. And, sir, if I have any sympathy for one class of people above another or one calling above another, it is for those who till the soil. I was raised upon a farm among farmers; I have not more than one relative of my name on the face of the earth who is not a farmer, and I believe I know that the farming interests have suffered less in the last five years than any other producing interest in the country. I know that in the district I represent the farmers have suffered but little in comparison to those engaged in mining and manufacturing, and where they have suffered the greatest is in the loss to some extent of a market for heavy produce in the towns affected by the prostration of the past few years. They have been receiving fair prices for their produce and have found a market for all the grain, stock, and wool and such commodities that they can raise; while, upon the other hand, those who have been engaged in the pursuits the gentleman characterizes as "merciless and grinding monopolies" have been compelled to close up their mills and furnaces in many instances, their capital has been making them little or no return in others, and the labor engaged in these pursuits has been thrown out of employment or poorly paid.

We cannot afford at this time to try experiments with any of the great industries of the land. By the census of 1870 it is shown that the manufacturing, mining, and mechanical products amounted to $4,220,235,442, while the agricultural products amounted to but $2,447,538,658, an excess of the manufacturing over agricultural of $1,772,786,784. And, Mr. Speaker, it is these industries that produced this large excess of wealth a few years ago that are to-day prostrated, suffering in their capital, their labor disorganized, and awaiting the result of this measure. I repeat, we cannot afford at this time to try any experiments with such industries.

From 1862 to 1873, a period of eleven years, we developed very largely the wealth of the country, and developed it to a very large extent by going in debt. We built from the close of the war till the crisis of 1873, a period of about eight years, thirty-five thousand miles of railroads in the United States, doubling our railroad mileage, and we went largely in debt for the means to accomplish this great result.

We opened mines; we built up furnaces and mills; we laid out towns and cities; we built and embellished towns and cities; we improved the country; we beautified our homes; we erected school-houses and institutions of learning, and in almost every possible way we expended large sums of money that we borrowed; and it is estimated that the indebtedness of the people of the United States, aside from the national debt, comprising State debts, city debts, county debts, and debts of corporations and firms and of private individuals, reaches the enormous sum of $7,000,000,000; and this vast indebtedness rests to a great extent upon those industries that were so largely developed from 1862 to 1873. I repeat, then, that this is no time to try experiments in legislation that affects the class of people that produced this great wealth only a few years ago. We need the help of every hand that is willing to work in this country in paying off this terrible mortgage that rests upon our people; and I cannot see the wisdom of taking a hundred bushels of wheat from the prairies of Illinois, shipping it to Liverpool, and there exchanging it for three tons of railroad iron, when the same exchange may be made in Saint Louis or Pittsburgh; and, when I remember the cost of the iron is mainly the labor employed upon it, I do not see why any one looking to the best interests of the American laborer can advocate any policy that will bring about such a change in our system. I know the chairman of the committee, the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, as well as the gentleman from Texas, makes an appeal in behalf of the oppressed and heavily taxed farmer; they enumerate the burdens of the farmer; they say that he "pays a tax of 35 per cent. on the paint with which his house is painted; 90 per cent. on his window glass; 35 per cent. on his nails; 53 per cent. on the screws; 30 per cent. on the door-locks," and so on.

Now, when it is remembered that these articles are from 30 to 50 per cent. cheaper than they ever were under what is denominated "revenue tariff," it will be difficult to see that the farmer pays this enormous tax as the result of protection.

I shall not stop here to discuss for any length of time the claim made half a century ago, that by home competition we could produce in this country from our indigenous raw material, so cheap and so abundant, cheaper wares than we could purchase from abroad, further than to say that the last few years have vindicated the policy of protection. Great Britain and other European countries are waiting to-day for a chance at the American market, waiting for an opportunity to break down our industries that they may again command this market; their journals are watching this struggle more carefully than many of our own people.

Capital in manufacturing is in the hands of few people in European countries. They control the prices of labor, and for the sake of breaking down any special branch of manufactures in this country they can afford to put their wares upon our market, for a time, at much less than their cost. They have pursued this line of policy from time to time in years past, and they will undoubtedly pursue it again if we break down the protection afforded by our laws.

Two weeks ago, in conversation with a gentleman residing in my district, engaged in the manufacture of glass, he informed me that he had just returned from a business trip of many hundred miles, in which he had been attempting to dispose of his goods at 90 per cent. of their cost, but that his trip was entirely fruitless and that he had not made a single sale. In answer to the query as to whether the market was supplied with his wares he answered, "By no means;" that there were few wares of his line on the market, but that dealers were awaiting the result of the Wood tariff bill; that Belgium was understood to have a mountain of glass ready to put upon our market in the event this bill became a law. Such has been the effect of this bill upon almost every industry of the country affected by its provisions.

Mr. Speaker, it is not, in my judgment, mainly a question of revenue that is contained in this bill, but it is almost entirely a question of labor. I have said that the main cost of the standard articles affected by the bill is the cost in labor of their production. I do not believe it the desire of any considerable portion of the people of this country to reduce or attempt to reduce American labor to the condition of the foreign laborer. I have shown the vast amount of capital invested in manufacturing. The indebtedness of this country rests largely and heavily upon that branch of business. In the last five years there has been an honest effort on the part of those engaged in the various branches of business alluded to to give labor such employment as will enable those engaged in it to support their families in decency and in comfort. It has been a severe struggle, and hundreds of establishments throughout the land have succumbed, while thousands of laborers have been thrown out of employment. I firmly believe the passage of this bill will ruin hundreds of others. I do not desire to see such a condition of things in this country as will reduce the wages of our working-people to the standard of European countries, and unless we offer them protection against the cheap labor of foreign countries they must be reduced to the same circumstances of life.

The matter of freights is a small item. Ocean freights especially are cheap and do not in the main amount to more than the difference in the prices of capital in this country and European countries; so that if we are compelled to manufacture at cheaper rates than we do at present it must be by a reduction of the wages of the operatives. Take, for instance, window-glass, now manufactured in this country at rates far below those of twenty years ago. The labor engaged in that branch of industry has been reduced to the very lowest point that an American laborer can maintain his family at; yet if he is required to come in competition with the laborers of Belgium he must prepare to work as a common laborer at $10 per month and board himself. His wife and his daughter must be prepared to go into the factories and do the drudgery and heavy work of common laborers in order to eke out an existence for the family. Such is the condition of the laborer engaged in the manufacture of window-glass in Belgium. Yet this bill reduces the tariff on glass, on the average production of a factory, 28 per cent. This reduction must come off the price of labor. And so with this average reduction that the chairman of the committee speaks of, of 15 per cent; it must come off the price paid for labor. The capital engaged in manufacturing is making little or no returns at present, and whenever we talk of reducing the tariff it means a reduction of the wages of those who do the work.

Now, it may be very well for the gentlemen on the other side of the House to talk of their friendship for the laboring-man, and I hear appeals made every day for the oppressed laborers of the country; resolutions are offered, speeches are made supposed to be in the interest of the laborer. If you will look through the country from Maine to Texas, you will find that the labor that to-day sends its complaint up to Congress is the labor that is to be affected by this measure.

I have already said that the farmer in the main is in comfortable condition; the price of his products is fair; he buys from 30 to 50 per cent. cheaper than he did before the war the necessities of life, and the want and the misery among the labor of the country is confined almost exclusively to those in our mining and manufacturing centers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is said to be a bill for the relief of the farmer, for the relief of the people, as against grinding monopolies. Let us see; there is upon the schedule of dutiable articles no single product that is so universally in use as that of sugar; it goes into every cupboard in the land. We imported last year from abroad about one hundred million dollars' worth of sugar, and yet this bill, framed in the interest of the people as against monopolies, retains the tax upon sugar, and, in fact, increases the rate of duty slightly. Sugar growing in this country is confined almost exclusively to the low lands of Louisiana; the plantations are in the hands of few individuals, and the production consumed entirely in this country. Why, if the bill is framed in the interest of commerce, as the chairman says it is, if it be framed in the interest of the consumer as the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Mississippi claim it is, why is this article of prime necessity and universal use retained at its present rate of taxation? Is it a bait for the vote of Louisiana in favor of this measure? I do not complain of the tax on sugar. I believe it is right. I am willing to pay it. I believe that the people who are cultivating the sugar-lands in Louisiana should be protected against the cheap labor of the islands (West Indies) and I am perfectly willing and shall cheerfully vote to maintain the present duties on sugars. But I warn the gentlemen from Louisiana, who represent the sugar interests, that this bill is only an entering wedge, that when Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New England have once seen their industries prostrated the industries of Louisiana will soon follow. I do not believe the taxes we pay to the General Government are oppressing the people of this country to any great extent. I do not believe that the failures in business, the depression throughout the country, are the consequence of Federal taxation. It is the vast private indebtedness incurred in a period of speculation that is tumbling the business interests of the country in every direction. We are told by the chairman of the committee and by other gentlemen who have addressed us upon this subject of taxation by tariff laws, that it is "immoral and wrong" in principle and in the interest of a privileged few.

Mr. Speaker, upon what principle does the Government tax its citizens? Take our internal-revenue taxation. We pay a tax upon the liquors and the tobacco that we consume. If we consume none, we pay no taxes. If we consume largely of liquors and tobacco, we pay largely of revenue taxes. The tariff is levied upon articles consumed by the rich and poor alike. We pay upon what we consume. We pay in proportion to our ability to purchase. The poor man who is dependent upon his day's labor to support himself and family, and the mechanic who makes but a few hundred dollars a year, and the agriculturist who lives mostly within himself, pays but very little revenue upon imported goods. If he buys to the extent of a hundred dollars per year, he pays upon what he buys, and upon that only. The man who has an income of but five hundred or a thousand dollars a year, and lives within that income, pays but very little revenue to the General Government. The man who spends from ten to twenty-five thousand dollars per year, who buys largely of silks, satins, laces, rich carpets, and luxuries for the use of his family, pays upon what he consumes.

I have never been able to see, sir, anything immoral, anything unjust, anything unfair, in this system of taxation, and while it maintains, as I believe and know it does, a large body of the people of this country in profitable employment we should maintain it, especially when it is shown by experience that we buy cheaper from our own people under this American system than when we purchased from foreign manufacturers and paid them large profits on their wares.

It is to our interest to diversify as far as we can the callings and industries of the people. In that consists our wealth. I do not believe that the mere matter of trade, barter, between our people and the people of other countries means wealth, means gain, means profit.

I have in my mind a community that in 1847 was driven out of the States of Illinois and Missouri, across what was then known as the Great American Desert, to the valley of the Salt Lake. They went into that valley with scarcely any of this world's goods, and they sat down patiently, a community within themselves. They were cut off by a wide stretch of inhospitable and almost impassable desert from the great world of commerce, trade, and business outside. They lived for twenty years before a railroad reached them; isolated from the rest of the world. In that time they introduced into their community almost every known branch of mechanism; they built manufacturing establishments and they manufactured their own clothing from the wool clipped from their own flocks; they were a self-sustaining and a self-supporting community and an independent people. Even the great organ that was built for the temple in which they worshiped was built at home by their own workmen. They sent hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars abroad to bring their co-religionists into the territory that they had made their home; and at the end of twenty-two years of complete isolation there was scarcely a community west of the Alleghany Mountains that had the same amount of property and the same wealth per capita as the Mormons of the Great Salt Lake. And while I am not averse to trade, or commerce, or exchange of our commodities with other countries, yet I repeat what I have heretofore said, that we have not always been the gainers by such trade and barter.

The wool industry is attacked by this measure, and as the district

I have the honor to represent is largely engaged in this branch of industry I desire to call attention to a few things in connection with it. The present tariff was framed after consultation and mutual concessions on the part of both the grower and the manufacturer of wool, and in my judgment it has been conducive to the best interests of the whole people, not only those engaged in these industries but the consumer as well.

In the year 1860 we produced in the United States about 60,000,000 pounds of wool, and the average value of the product for ten years prior to that time was little more than 50 cents per pound. We produced in 1876 208,000,000 pounds of wool, an increase of three and one-half times in the quantity, and the price has averaged in the ten years prior to the last date (1876) about 48½ cents per pound, showing that this enormous increase in the production has not materially interfered with the price. The country stands this large increase in the wool clip from the fact that we are enabled to do our own manufacturing, and our wool clip is consumed largely and principally at home.

In addition to this, we imported largely of foreign wools, mainly from South America and Australia, for use in our manufactories. In 1875 we paid duties on raw materials amounting to $6,478,000, and of this sum $3,790,000 came from duties on wool. The annual value of our manufactures of wool, including worsted and carpets, is estimated at about $200,000,000. We have encouraged the growing of fine wools, and we have sent to the Paris exposition some as fine specimens of wools as will be there on exhibition. Wool-growing has become an established business in many parts of the country, especially in the West, where the wool clip amounted to nothing scarcely prior to the tariff legislation of 1862. Our wools brought in competition with the cheap wools grown in South America and Australia, if the protection afforded by our laws shall be withdrawn, will materially injure this branch of industry. The single province of New South Wales produced in 1876 160,000,000 pounds of wool against 200,000,000 pounds in the United States.

The production and manufacture of woolen goods in this country has been a matter of great benefit to all the people, varied our industries, and it has given us cheaper domestic woolens than we were ever able to purchase abroad; and in what I have said in relation to the wool clip and manufacture of wool I have said nothing of the large supply of cheap, wholesome, animal food as the result of this increase in our flocks. It would be unwise in the extreme to ruin this great industry for the benefit of the foreign wool-grower and manufacturer; you will simply destroy the business of growing and manufacturing wools and woolens, without any compensation in any direction.

Mr. Speaker, the people of this country are brought for the first time face to face with the great question of work for those who are out of employment, profitable labor for those who are willing to perform it. This is a question that must be dealt with dispassionately; partisan politics should be put aside. It is a question of great danger if left in the hands of those who seek to make personal or partisan capital out of it. In dealing with this question, and, in fact, with any great economic question, the endeavor should be made to do the "greatest good to the greatest number."

Great Britain is an example of a great commercial nation. Her ships go out on every sea, to every clime; her commerce is as wide and extended as the ocean; and yet Great Britain has within her dominions a degree of wretchedness, of poverty, among her toiling millions that no American desires to see among our countrymen. Commerce enriches the few, builds up great cities; it makes merchant princes, builds up vast wealth in the hands of those who engage in it. But in the main it is agriculture, manufactures, the mechanic arts that give employment and comfort to the many. I am willing to do all honor to those of our countrymen who engage in commerce, who go out to compete with Britain and with other maritime powers in their struggle for the commerce and the carrying trade of the world.

But, sir, I believe that true economy requires of us to remember the quiet homes in which dwell the laborers of the country and their families, those who produce the wealth of the land; for it is "not that which we buy that enriches us, but it is that which we produce." The wealth of the world comes mainly from its labor; it is earned in the sweat of men's faces. And while, as I have said, I would do all honor to those engaged in commerce, in trade, in barter, I believe it to be our highest, our first duty to look to the welfare of those who mainly produce the great wealth of our country.

I am willing and should be glad to see our commerce flourish, to see American ships carrying American products to every sea and to every country upon the Globe. But I will not vote to build up commerce or trade at the expense of our home industries. In them lies our greatest strength; in them we have independence.

The gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, says in his opening remarks:

> We must encourage and promote the adoption of such relations with other nations as will open up the markets of the world and make the whole universe contribute to our prosperity.

I do not agree with the gentleman from New York or those who believe with him that, because we can buy woolen fabrics, cotton fabrics, iron, steel, glass, and other necessaries of life cheaper in Manchester and Birmingham than we can manufacture them in Lowell or in Pittsburgh, we should abandon our industries, throwing out of employment the thousands of men, women, and children engaged in them, and carry across the ocean our raw material and barter it for the manufactured commodity. I believe that in the long run we are the losers by such traffic and that in such barter we are paying tribute rather than collecting it.

This question, Mr. Speaker, seems to some extent to assume a party aspect, and the laborers of the country again find the democratic party, as in 1846, holding up to their gaze the beauties of the Walker tariff. Is it to be understood that the democratic party, as it comes into power in this Government, will abandon the industries that have been fostered and protected and that have so greatly flourished and enriched the country in the past sixteen years? Is this the friendship they are about to show to the labor of the country, and are the vast sums of money that have been invested by the rich and the poor alike in establishing a system that may be truly called American, one that makes us independent, to be abandoned for the old order of things? If so, let us understand it now; let the people take warning, and if democracy means free trade, if democracy means competition without protection between the American laborer and his family and the laborers of Europe, let it be known, and, in my judgment, the party that proposes it will receive from the workingmen of the country such rebuke as they deserve.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, the question of internal improvements brings to my mind the first time I ever saw the great Carolinian, John C. Calhoun. It was in my boyhood, when he presided over the commercial convention held in Memphis, Tennessee. It was my first view also of the Mississippi River, and the first impressions of both are linked together in my memory—the Father of Waters and the Aristotle of modern times. He was then the leader of the strict-construction school of politicians, and yet he then advocated the improvement of the Mississippi River by the General Government and its connection by railroad with the Atlantic seaboard. He advised the granting of land subsidies to such a road and also recommended that the iron rails should be admitted free of duty, which then amounted to $2,000 per mile. And even then his far-reaching vision contemplated the building of a Pacific railroad. In his speech on that occasion he said:

> In conclusion, your position in point of country is truly remarkable for climate, fertility, and extent, but great as it is now a more brilliant future awaits you. It will not be more than twenty years before you will be deliberating not how you shall connect your valley with the Southeastern States, but how you shall connect your valley with the Pacific Ocean, and how across the continent you shall connect the commerce of the Atlantic and Pacific and thus control the transit of the products of the world.

This was in 1845, and before another great American intellect, Thomas H. Benton, pointing across the Rocky Mountains to the setting sun uttered his startling paradox: "There is the East!" When we went to war with Mexico one of our first movements was to take possession of the Pacific coast, and when the Gadsden treaty was made we paid ten millions for a barren strip of New Mexico for the avowed purpose, as then expressed in Congress, of having a railroad route to the Pacific Ocean. The Government commenced the building of a Pacific road during the administration of Mr. Pierce, himself a strict-construction democrat, and under the direction of Jefferson Davis, then Secretary of War, who was a pupil and follower of Mr. Calhoun, by ordering three routes to be surveyed by the most scientific engineers of that day and time.

In the political campaign of 1856 which followed, all parties declared themselves in favor of governmental aid to Pacific railroads, as follows:

The democratic party, represented in national convention at Cincinnati in June, 1856, adopted the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the democratic party recognizes the great importance, in a political and commercial point of view, of a safe and speedy communication through our own territory between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the Union, and that it is the duty of the Federal Government to exercise all its constitutional power to the attainment of that object, thereby binding the Union of these States in indissoluble bonds and opening to the rich commerce of Asia an overland transit from the Pacific to the Mississippi River and the great lakes of the North.

The republican party also met in convention in June, 1856, in Philadelphia, and passed the following resolution:

> Resolved, That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean by the most central and practicable route is imperatively demanded by the interests of the whole country, and that the Federal Government ought to render immediate and efficient aid in its construction, and, as an auxiliary thereto, the immediate construction of an emigrant route on the line of the railroad.

Mr. Buchanan was nominated upon the democratic platform, and during the canvass, September 17, 1856, in a letter to the chairman of the democratic executive committee of California, he said:

> WHEATLAND, September 17, 1856.
> SIR: I have received numerous communications from sources in California entitled to high regard in reference to the proposed railroad. As it would be impossible for me to answer them all, I deem it most proper and respectful to address you in a general answer in your official capacity. In performing this duty to the citizens of California, I act in perfect consistency with the self-imposed restriction contained in my letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency not to answer interrogatories raising new and different issues from those presented by the Cincinnati convention, because that convention has itself adopted a resolution in favor of this great work.
> I then desire to state briefly that, concurring with the convention, I am decidedly favorable to the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and I derive the authority to do this from the constitutional power to declare war and the constitutional duty to repel invasions. In my judgment, Congress possesses the same power to make appropriations for the construction of this road strictly for the purpose of national defense that it has to erect fortifications at the mouth of the harbor of San Francisco. Indeed the necessity, with a view to repel foreign invasion from California, is as great in the one case as the other. Neither will there be danger from the precedent, for it is almost impossible to conceive that any case attended by such extraordinary and unprecedented circumstances can ever again occur in our history.

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES BUCHANAN.

To B. F. WASHINGTON, Esq.,
Chairman Democratic State Central Committee, California.

If before there was any doubt as to the meaning of the platform, this declaration of the candidate settled it. After this declaration he was elected, and in his inaugural address he strongly recommended the same doctrine.

Again in 1860 all parties were united upon this question:

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY COMMITTED TO THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SUCH AID.

The democratic national convention of 1860, which at Charleston, South Carolina, nominated Stephen A. Douglas for President, adopted as part of their platform the following resolution:

"3. That one of the necessities of the age, in a military, commercial, and postal point of view, is a speedy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States; and the democratic party pledge such constitutional Government aid as will insure the construction of a railroad to the Pacific coast at the earliest practicable period."

The convention held at Baltimore in the same year, which nominated John C. Breckinridge for President, also adopted as part of its platform the following:

"Whereas one of the greatest necessities of the age, in a political, commercial, postal, and military point of view, is a speedy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the national democratic party do hereby pledge themselves to use every means in their power to secure the passage of some bill, to the extent of the constitutional authority of Congress, for the construction of a Pacific railway, from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, at the earliest practicable moment."

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY COMMITTED TO THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SUCH AID.

In the republican platform of 1860 we find the following proposition:

"That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean is imperatively demanded by the interests of the whole country, and that the Federal Government ought to render immediate and efficient aid in its construction."

But while all parties were thus united as to the power and duty to aid such a road sectional jealousies prevented the selection of any particular route, and the proposition to have three roads was being discussed when these sectional jealousies ended in a civil war. One road has now been built by Government aid on the forty-first parallel, another is demanded on the forty-seventh and another on the thirty-second parallel. Aid should be given to both to carry out in good faith the quasi pledge of the Government and I shall vote for aid to both, but I propose now to discuss the merits of the Texas and Pacific Railway.

The bill for this railway reported from the committee is of great importance to those who are advocating its passage, and the variety and strength of the opposition to it shows its magnitude before the country.

Its opponents may be classed under four different heads, and I propose briefly to notice the positions of each.

The first class is composed of democrats who claim to be opposed upon constitutional grounds to the granting of subsidies by the General Government for any purpose. This class is led and represented by my distinguished colleague on the committee from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] from whom I would differ with great reluctance on any point, because I recognize in him a democrat of sterling integrity, strong convictions, and most unflinching courage in the support of his principles; and although it is well known that he was and is opposed to us in this movement, he has resorted to no unfair advantage, and I must say that to his manly and unselfish course upon the committee in the selection of a chairman we are indebted as much as to any other one man in the House for the opportunity of bringing our bill fairly before it.

The second class is composed of the more radical republicans, who believe in the power of the General Government to carry on works of internal improvement, and who have favored the granting of subsidies to be expended in the North and East, but who are opposed to the appropriation of a single dollar that shall go to building up the South. Its leaders need no special description from me, for "by their works shall ye know them."

The third and most violent class is composed of the officers and lobbyists of the Central Pacific Railroad, which has obtained all the aid that it desires, and is now strenuously opposed to the construction of any competing line which may interfere with the rich harvest it is now reaping from its great and overshadowing monopoly.

The fourth and perhaps the most dangerous class is composed, in Congress and out, of presidential aspirants in the democratic party, who seem to think it essential to their good standing in the national democracy that they should be constantly shaking their skirts clear of southern improvements. This class is represented by a number of distinguished gentlemen, who each fondly hopes that in the storm of the next democratic national convention the presidential lightning may strike him; and lest I should seem invidious in omitting some, I will mention no names.

Let us consider first

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

The proper construction of the Constitution as to the powers of the General Government involves questions of vital importance which have divided the best intellects our country has produced, and when men and parties differ upon great constitutional questions there must be some arbiter to decide between us.

We of the State-rights school once contended that there could be no arbiter to decide constitutional questions for a State. We claimed that each State had not only the right to judge for itself as to the infractions of the Constitution, but as to the mode and measure of redress. When the right so to decide was denied to the Southern States they appealed to arms and submitted that question to "the wager of battle." The verdict was returned against us; the judgment was pronounced in the thunder of artillery, it was written with the sword, it was sealed with the blood of brethren who fell grappling each other in the struggle of death, and we must in future construe the power of the Government under the light thrown on it by this decision. Our arbiter now must be the precedents established by the practice of the Government and by legal and legislative construction. Custom and precedent made the common law. The British constitution is but an accumulation or accretion of time-honored customs. Our Government was framed upon a written constitution, which was intended to be a crystallization of reason and thought, but its very terseness left it open to construction and in the process of that construction the precedents of yesterday become the law of to-day. As General Jackson expressed it:

The public good and the nature of our institutions require that individual differences should yield to a well-settled acquiescence of the people and the confederated authorities in particular constructions of the Constitution on doubtful points. Not to yield this much to the spirit of our institutions would impair the stability and defeat the objects of the Constitution itself.

The ancient schoolmen proved by correct syllogism that no man could move because the same body could not occupy two different places at the same time; the practical student soon showed the fallacy of this argument and gave practical demonstration of his power to move by moving. So when the State-rights men had proved by unanswerable logic and authority that the General Government had no power to coerce a State to remain in the Union, the practical Union man answered the argument by practical coercion. And now when our opponents come forward with logic and argument drawn from the resolutions of '98 and '99 to show that the Government has no power to make works of internal improvements, the practical statesman of to-day answers that she has done it; that she built dirt roads for military and postal purposes in the earliest days of the Republic, and that, keeping pace with the progress of civilization, she has dug canals and built railroads in the zenith of her power. In fact, the power to build dirt roads carries with it the power to build any other kind of road that may be necessary and beneficial. Mr. Gallatin clearly expressed this when he claimed the power to make "artificial roads;" and Mr. Davis concluded the argument when he said:

If we can construct them of earth, why not of iron? If we can use wooden rails, as we do in crossing marshes, why not use them of iron? And if you can use iron rails and lay them crosswise, why can you not lay them lengthwise? And this—brings us to the construction of a railroad.

If gentlemen ask me to point to the line or the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the Government to grant aid to the Texas and Pacific Railroad, I answer, to the New England man, that he will find it somewhere very near the clause which gives the power to protect manufactures or to grant bounties to New England fisheries; to the New Yorker, that he will find it where he found authority for mail subsidies to steamship lines or for appropriations to clean out Hell Gate passage; to the western man, I say, "Go look for it where you found the authority to build the Cumberland road, to dig your canals, or to grant land subsidies to railroads in Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Colorado, and California;" to the extremists of the South I say, "You will find it where Mr. Jefferson found the authority to purchase the State of Louisiana and the mouth of the Mississippi and where Mr. Polk found authority for the annexation of the Republic of Texas;" and to the honest and fair-minded men of all sections I say, "You will find it in the great doctrine of equity and of justice, which bids you do for the South what you have done for the North."

THE DECISION OF THE COURTS.

I have said our only arbiter on constitutional questions now is the rule established by the courts and the practice of the Government.

The Supreme Court of the United States has in three distinct methods decided the constitutional power of Congress over this question. In the Granger cases it decided that Congress had power to regulate the rates of railroads running through more than one State under the power to regulate commerce. In the recent telegraph case in Florida it decided that Congress had power over telegraph lines under the same clause of the Constitution; and in the celebrated interest case of the Union Pacific it decided the very question now at issue, that Congress had power to lend money to a Pacific Railroad Company.

THE PRACTICE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

When we look to the practice of the Government we find that it has built dirt roads and turnpikes, and that outside of this Union and Central Pacific it has contributed by land and bonds to the building of railroads in thirteen States of this Union; that it has dug canals and cleaned out rivers and harbors; that it has constructed breakwaters, light-houses, buoys, and piers, and that its great men in all ages have favored the exercise of these powers.

George Washington signed the first bill for the erection of light-houses, buoys, and piers.

Mr. Jefferson signed the first bill for the construction of the Cumberland road, and in his last annual message recommended that—

The surplus revenue be appropriated to the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, and education and other great foundations of prosperity and union.

Mr. Madison, in his special message upon the New York canal, and in his seventh annual message, showed clearly the inclination of his mind in favor of works of internal improvement, although he subsequently vetoed bills for this purpose. Mr. Monroe could never explain the antagonism between the recommendations of his message and his subsequent veto of the measures apparently recommended. General Jackson is shown by the record to have voted constantly for works of internal improvement while a member of the Senate, though he subsequently, as President, vetoed the Maysville road bill. Mr. Polk's first message not only indorsed the recommendation of his Secretary of War, who clearly recommended internal improvement, but he was openly charged in Congress by a leading member of his own party with having promised to sustain the river and harbor bill which he subsequently vetoed. And the democratic convention of 1848, while it indorsed the veto message of Mr. Polk, nominated as its standard bearer for the Presidency General Cass, who had voted for the bill which the President had vetoed. And I might add to this list of inconsistencies that some of the very gentlemen now upon this floor who are opposed to granting aid to the Texas and Pacific Railway not only voted for but advocated and sustained the subsidies for the Union and Central Pacific.

But while we find these inconsistencies upon the general subject of internal improvements, we find that in 1856 and again in 1860, all parties, with most remarkable unanimity, were united upon the power and duty of the Government to grant "such substantive aid as will insure the construction of a railroad to the Pacific coast at the earliest practicable period." And not only was the public mind thus united in regard to the necessity of granting Government aid to the building of a railroad to the Pacific, but when we look into the debates in Congress we find evidences clear and unmistakable that but for the collision between the North and South at that time two, if not three railroads to the Pacific would unquestionably have been built, and that one of these would have been on the thirty-second parallel. But the civil war forced upon the country, earlier perhaps than otherwise would have been, the necessity of building a Pacific railroad, and in the then condition of affairs, that road was necessarily confined to the northern portion of the Government. But the war is now over, and we come back to the question again and take it up just where Mr. Douglas and Mr. Davis left it. If the building of three roads was deemed necessary then, and if the building of one has been accomplished, it is all the more necessary that the others should now be constructed. Many gentlemen now upon this floor who aided and assisted in procuring governmental aid for the Union and Central Pacific, did so upon the ground that it was a great military necessity and they yielded to the necessity upon the very same principle that they agreed to the issuance of greenbacks, to support the Government and carry on the war. Some of these gentlemen now think that this was extraconstitutional, beyond the power of the General Government, and that the precedent should not be followed because the overruling necessity has passed. To these I would say that the same argument which sustains the continuance of a greenback currency because of the debts which the war entailed upon us, sustains the passage of this bill. The war itself has ceased, but the disastrous and desolating effects of the war are still upon us, and if the doctrine of overruling necessity could be invoked to sustain intact the mighty fabric of Union which our fathers made, the same doctrine of overruling necessity can certainly be invoked to repair the ravages of war and restore each and every portion of this once happy land to unity, peace and prosperity.

But upon this subject some even of our southern friends seem disposed to talk about qualms of conscience and constitutional objections. To them I would say, in the language of Mr. LAMAR, the chairman of this committee in the last Congress, in his able and exhaustive report:

If the past aid given was right, then so is this. If the past aid given was wrong, its result can only be corrected by allowing it to work until it has corrected its own partiality.

But, Mr. Speaker, I regret to see that Illinois, which was the first State in the Union to receive Government aid in lands for the construction of a railroad, now furnishes the leader and some of the ablest opponents of this measure. Mr. Douglas, once the pride and glory of the Illinois democracy, introduced the bill into Congress which granted aid to the Illinois Central Railroad, and to the Mobile and Ohio, running through Alabama and Mississippi. And when the measure was under discussion, the whole Mississippi delegation, composed of some of the most reliable democrats of that day, A. G. Brown, W. S. Featherstone, W. McWillie, and Jacob Thompson, all stood side by side with Douglas and the Illinois democracy. But our friends from Illinois now tell us that this was an appropriation of lands to a State, and not to a corporation; and so it was. But it was a donation to the State for the particular railroad named in the act, and there could be no difference between this and a direct grant to the corporation itself.

Our friends further tell us that there is a difference between granting aid in land and aid in money, and some profess to be willing to make any appropriation of land that may be needed. If this be true, if aid may be granted in land but not in money, then Virginia, which gave an empire to the Union, could receive no benefit in return, because, forsooth, there are no public lands in her borders; and Texas, which brought into the Union a principality of lands to bear their portion of the Government burdens, could, for the same reason, receive no Government aid. But again, the granting of lands to Illinois for its Central road at a time when the country was prosperous and when there was money and resources in abundance was aid sufficient to accomplish the purpose. A grant of land now to the Texas Pacific or any other southern enterprise would be like offering gold to a hungry and shipwrecked mariner on some lone rock in the ocean. If we are to have aid, let it be such aid as we can utilize. Let it be such aid as will accomplish the purpose. Let it be aid which, in the language of the democratic platform of 1860, "will insure the building of a railroad to the Pacific coast at the earliest practicable period."

There can be and there is no practical difference between granting aid in lands and in money received from the sale of lands or any other source of public revenue. It is no answer to say that the Government receives as much for half its lands as it would otherwise have received for the whole. If the Government should donate money to build a road and retain all its lands it could be compensated just as well from the increased value of its lands. The principle is the same.

Another violent opponent of subsidies to the South is my colleague on the Pacific Railroad Committee from New York, [Mr. HEWITT;] a gentleman whose State has received fifteen and a half millions for public works and whose city has been enriched by munificent subsidies to steamship lines; who expends his sympathy on the starving Chinaman and reserves none for the southern sufferer of our own land; who could find authority in the Constitution for an appropriation of $150,000 for his hot-corn show at the Paris exposition, but can find no authority to lend even the credit of the Government to a road that is to be a great national highway, which shall penetrate its territories rich in mineral and agricultural resources, which will afford facilities for the military protection of our Indian and Mexican frontier, and which was chartered by the Government and named in the charter "military and post-road" for the benefit of the country.

My New England friends upon the committee are also opposed to subsidies, although millions upon millions of dollars have been expended in protecting their manufactures and in fishing bounties to New England fishermen from the beginning of the Government. And I fear, Mr. Speaker, we shall be called upon again to pay five and a half millions found due under the Geneva award for fish which our New England brothers have taken in British waters without authority of law. We paid for these fish once in the shape of bounties to fisheries under the plea that it was a school for American seamen; we paid for these fish a second time when we ate them, and now I presume we will be called upon to pay for these fish a third time to the owner of the waters from which they were illegally taken.

These are certainly a nice kettle of fish, Mr. Speaker, and would do well to serve up with our hot-corn cakes at the Paris exposition. And these gentlemen whose States and whose sections have been amply provided for certainly stand in a most favorable attitude to close the vault of the Treasury and cry out no further subsidies from the General Government.

SUBSIDIES.

These gentlemen profess to be opposed to the grants of any subsidies and yet they favor the renewal of the land grant to the Northern Pacific. They call it but an extension, to satisfy their consciences, but the stockholders and owners have admitted that their rights have expired, and our democratic opponents who favor the Northern Pacific forget that the war which the democracy have recently made against grants to corporations was to grants of land and not grants of money, upon the ground that the lands should be preserved for the actual settler.

In 1858–'59 the democratic proposition was to donate ten millions in money to any company that would give security for building a road to the Pacific. It was introduced by Mr. Davis, and Mr. Douglas defended it upon the ground that the Government could make mail contracts and make payments in advance to enable the contractor to buy stage-coaches or to build ships to carry the mails.

The democratic platforms of 1868 and 1876 denounced the land grants, but not one word was said about money grants to Pacific railroads. Now these new lights in the democratic church, these new Daniels that have come to judgment, can support the Northern Pacific bill which renews a land grant of forty millions and takes from the actual settler the right to settle upon some of the finest lands of the world, but cannot support the Texas Pacific bill which grants no money, which simply lends the credit of the Government and which leaves the lands granted in the hands of the Government to be disposed of to the actual settler at Government price. And yet these men expect southern democrats to submit without complaint to this pharisaical refinement. Sir, such elastic consciences would command a premium in Plymouth church.

But, sir, in this case technically we ask no subsidy. The Texas and Pacific Railway simply asks the Government to become its accommodation indorser for the interest on its bonds, which will be about $1,200 per annum per mile, and this is to be paid every six months, not by the Government, as in the Central Pacific case, but by the railway. To secure the payment of this a first mortgage is given upon the road, its franchises and property, including the earnings of five hundred miles of road already built. If the road is one-half as valuable as its friends believe it to be the Government will never be called on to pay one dollar for it and there will be no subsidy given. But in this argument I propose to meet gentlemen upon their own ground, and, supposing it to be a subsidy, the interest of the whole country and equity and justice to the South demand that it should be given.

THE NECESSITY FOR THE ROAD.

Claiming that the constitutional question has been settled by precedents, we come to the only real question of importance involved properly in this controversy, the necessity for another road to the Pacific and the national character of this enterprise. This has been so clearly shown by the able report of Mr. HOUSE that but little more need be said about it.

The object to be attained is the rich trade of the East, which the whole world has been striving for since the days of the Argonautic expedition. The millions that England and the other European powers have expended on railroads to the East and for the Suez Canal admonish us to improve all the advantages of position which nature has placed in our hands. One road is not sufficient if we would compete with Europe for the trade of Asia. The building of the Northern Pacific will benefit the country, the building of the Texas Pacific will prove a still greater benefit. It will shorten the distance eleven hundred miles between the oceans. It will reduce the expenses of the people twenty millions annually on the rates now extorted by existing monopolies. It will avoid the dangers and obstructions of snows. It will increase the speed, safety, and efficiency of transportation and travel. It will decrease the time two days between the Atlantic and Pacific, and, by opening the harbor of San Diego, will save at least four days' time and expense upon Asiatic exports and imports. And just here I would say that our New York friends who have expended so much on Hell Gate passage are advocating through a pamphlet the expenditure of two millions more to improve Port Morris, near the same passage, upon the plea that it would save one day to transcontinental commerce.

In all ages empires, monarchies, and republics have deemed it essential for the preservation of the unity and integrity of their domains that artificial roads should be constructed, not only for military purposes, but for the benefit of commercial intercourse, and, while these works of internal improvements have contributed to bind different portions of their respective governments together, they have at the same time incidentally afforded the means of giving employment to hungry and starving millions of their people. When Rome would appease the clamor of the plebeians she built the Appian Way. The First Consul of France paved his way to the throne by public works which are still the admiration of the world. When Napoleon III felt unsteady on his throne and feared the uprising of the Parisian mob he tore down the city of Paris and rebuilt it at extravagant cost and in the face of the prediction that France would be bankrupt. But the subsequent prosperity of France and the splendor of his reign, commencing and ending as it did like a romance, proves the wisdom of his policy and indicates the benefit to be derived by any government from following a similar practice under similar circumstances. I am no advocate of making this Government a great poor-house to feed the paupers of the country, but the lessons of history teach us that there are times when a government may enter upon great works of national improvement, if for no other purpose than to develop the resources, harmonize the sentiments, and utilize the labor of its suffering population. There are now not less than three millions of people out of employment. And the exhibitions witnessed during the last year amid the strikes and labor agitations, the fierce scenes of men maddened to desperation by the fear of starvation; the crush of ruined and falling walls, as the devouring flames flashed over them; the blood of men shot down like wild beasts in the streets; the screams of women and children, and the shouts of a sympathizing populace warn us that there never was a more fitting time than now to learn lessons of wisdom from the governments of the past.

The wisdom of building railroads for military purposes was most strikingly illustrated by the use made of them in our great civil war and the recent campaign of Russia against her old enemy of the East.

That there was a necessity for Pacific railroads was demonstrated in argument by the great leaders in Congress ten years before the work was commenced, and what seemed but argument and rhetoric then was soon fully verified by the construction of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads. Notwithstanding the immense frauds in construction, these roads have greatly benefited the Government. The Utah war, carried on before these roads were built, cost many times more money than wars of greater magnitude recently carried on in the same country against an enemy more difficult to reach, and a similar necessity for railroad transportation of troops and munitions of war may soon arise on our southwestern frontier.

A year ago there was no greater danger of a war between Russia and Turkey than there is now between Mexico and the United States, and the prudence and foresight which induced Russia to build her railroad lines to the East should teach us to build our lines to the West. To-day near one-half the United States Army is stationed on the Mexican border, and the cost of military and mail transportation will more than compensate the Government for the amount she is asked to indorse for the Texas and Pacific Railway.

The necessity in a commercial point of view is shown by the tide of immigration which has already poured into Texas, keeping pace with the construction of the railroad, building up towns and cities in the wilderness at every depot, and which is now standing still and impatiently waiting for a forward movement, and appealing to Congress for the aid which alone can set that tide again in motion; and these seem to me arguments sufficient to overcome the objections of our first class of opponents.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The second class of our opponents, as I have said, is composed of the more violent of the republican party, who though advocates of internal improvement are still opposed to any measure that looks to the material development of the South. While we have no hope of winning over to our support these men, we have reason to believe that all who love justice and fairness will agree that what has been done for one section should now be done for the other, and that all who revere the name of Daniel Webster and whose love for the Union is marked with the same catholic devotion to each and every part, will gladly lend Government aid to revive the resources and reanimate the markets of the South, that, like bread cast upon the waters, it may return after many days.

This is no party measure. It is a great national measure. There were eight democrats and five republicans on the committee which reported this bill. The democrats were equally divided, four against four, and the reports show that every northern democrat was against while every southern democrat was for the bill. It is evident, therefore, that we are indebted to northern republicans and not to northern democrats for its favorable report; and it is to be remarked that the eastern republicans were against us while the western republicans were for us.

There is a significance in this vote which the student of politics will not fail to consider. Mr. Calhoun, as far back as 1845, said the Mississippi River was a great inland sea, and that its waters washed an empire. Since then that empire has grown rapidly in power, and to-day the sixteen States which are washed by the Mississippi and its tributaries contain a majority of the electoral votes of this Union, and their people are natural allies. From the great Northwest came the boldest and best soldiers of the Federal Army. They won the first victories against the South, and they are the first now to extend a helping hand to a fallen foe. This is a lesson we shall not soon forget, and the republicans who show this disposition will learn that the hearts of men who were brave in battle and firm under oppression yield to kindness what they deny to hate. Political parties are now undergoing a change. The currency question has separated political friends and brought foes together. The tariff question and the income tax will divide us still further. Upon these questions the West and the South have principally united. The South is the producer of a gold-bearing staple, and might have united with the hard-money men of the East if we had not sympathized with the suffering West; and now when the question of our material development comes up we shall watch with deep anxiety the East and the West to see which shall sympathize most with us. We look first to our democratic brethren. We point them to the fact that when the South was represented here by republicans the republican party stood ready to help her. Southern claims were freely paid by a republican Congress to the extent of $100,000,000.

By a republican Congress the Texas and Pacific Railroad was chartered and a land grant given; a survey of the Mississippi River preparatory to an appropriation for levees was made; a levee bill passed the lower House of a republican Congress, and funds were distributed for agricultural colleges in the South. It now remains to be seen whether a democratic South shall receive less from a democratic Congress than a republican South received from a republican Congress. In answer to my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who appealed to me in such complimentary language, I agree very largely with him on the question of war claims. I ask nothing for war claims. But we ask a just distribution of the public funds for public improvements.

If our democratic friends refuse this to us because they fear they may be defeated for re-election, I say to them they must remember that we, too, have constituents to please. If we ally ourselves with a party which is afraid to do justice to our constituents they may leave us at home and select other Representatives, who may make other alliances with men who are not afraid to do justice to their friends. To the republicans I say, you have made fatal mistakes in your treatment of the South, in your reconstruction measures. But for these measures and the spirit which prompted them your party might have found a broad and enduring basis in southern society.

The policy of distrust, hate, and oppression cemented the southern whites in opposition. The continuance of this policy while it will not unite the North insures the continuance of a solid South. The next President, if elected by the people, whether he comes from the East or the West, must possess two essential requisites. He must have been loyal to the Union during the war of secession to satisfy the North, and he must favor the material development of the South now to satisfy us. Let those who aspire to this position take notice.

But to return to the Texas Pacific Railway. The bill presented by the committee, though I support it, is not what I would have preferred. While I do not desire an inflation of greenback currency beyond what it was when the resumption act was passed I wish all the reissue to be expended in public improvements, and the bill introduced by me to build this road with greenbacks expressed my sentiments fully.

The aid to be granted under either bill is but lending the credit of the Government. In one case the Government lends its own notes of hand which answer all the purposes of money; her citizens become her creditors in one sense, for they trust her promise and are willing to wait her pleasure to pay. On the other hand the Government is the creditor of her own citizens who are the stockholders of the railroads and who bind themselves and their property to pay principal and interest of the money she has advanced to them, and the debt will be confined at home. It secures an increase of taxable values created on the credit of the Government alone.

If the other bill is adopted the Government lends its credit for the use of its citizens but not to its own citizens. The railroads will rush into the foreign money markets with their bonds, the interest on which, payable in coin, is guaranteed by the Government, and the bonds will be sold at a discount to secure the money necessary to build the roads, and whether the interest is met by the railroads or the Government we have another coin drain started from our country. This is unwise and unnecessary at this time. We have no need for gold and silver as a circulating medium as long as we continue greenbacks as a legal tender; but gold and silver have been and ever will be the gauge by which the values of the world are measured, and it is wise that we should create no unnecessary drains to draw these precious metals from us. But I assert that neither gold nor silver ever were or ever will be the circulating medium of trade, because they are too cumbersome and because there never was and never will be a sufficient amount of these metals in the world for this purpose. That they have circulated to a considerable extent all admit, but the trade of the world has been and ever will be carried on through bank-notes, bills of exchange, and commercial paper. The coin of the world has been but a measure of value and a basis of credit, and I favored the remonetization of silver because its withdrawal enhanced the value of gold, thereby elevating the standard of value and reducing the basis of credit. Coin is not and never was the sole basis of credit. Property is the great basis and in proportion as any species of property will bring cash at a forced sale is it more valuable as a basis of credit; and just here I would remind gentlemen that the blow which struck out of existence one thousand millions of slave property, which brought cash on forced sale, was the blow which prostrated the South and crippled the whole money power of the Government. While this, from a humanitarian standpoint is not now to be deplored, no statesman can fully understand our financial troubles who fails to recognize this fact.

The greenbacks which the Government had issued flowed into the South at the close of the war and tended to fill the vacuum which the destruction of slave property had created. But the rapid contraction of the currency which followed; the enhancement of gold value by the demonetization of silver, and the increase of the public debt by making bonds payable in gold that were payable in greenbacks, struck a blow that was disastrous to both North and South. We of the South are better prepared, poor as we are, than any other portion of the Union for the resumption of specie payments, because almost our whole wealth consists in our annual crop, which will bring gold in any market of the world. And if we had been disposed to be selfish, if we were filled with the malice and hatred we are often charged with here, we would have united with the hard-money men and rejoiced in the bankruptcies and failures which are daily toppling to ruin the gigantic fortunes of the East and West. But we know that what brings ruin to any portion of the Union brings suffering to the rest, and, on the other hand, that the prosperity of one section brings comfort to the other. We have listened to the cry of suffering from our western brethren and have come to their relief. But, sir, there is no need to recoin the silver dollar or to reissue the greenback note unless some means are devised by which the people who have nothing to offer but their labor can get them.

We come to you now proposing a measure of relief. I ask that you shall enter upon this great work of national importance and that you shall build it with greenback money. It is a measure of triple relief, relief to the South in developing her resources, relief to the country by increasing the amount of taxable property and of the circulating medium, and relief to the hungry and naked by giving them work that shall appease their hunger and cover their nakedness. The greenback is based upon all the property of all the States, and this basis of credit is sufficient to make it what the great orator of Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] called it, "the best money in the world." But its issuance can afford no relief to the starving laborer unless it is placed within reach of his labor.

THE SOUTHERN AND CENTRAL PACIFIC OPPOSITION.

We come next to the opposition of the men who control the Central Pacific and its connecting lines, men few in number but of marked financial ability and powerful in all the influences which money can control. The chief agent of this road, and now the chief operator here for the Southern Pacific, has declared on more than one occasion that there was no necessity for more than one road to the Pacific; and yet we have seen him and his confederates sitting like vampires upon the Pacific coast sucking the life-blood from the transcontinental commerce, and watching every new road to absorb or strangle it. When the Atlantic and Pacific was chartered they were here asking leave to connect with it that they might kill it. When the Texas and Pacific was chartered, they were here asking leave to connect with it, and under pretense of meeting it, they have left their legitimate work behind and pressed forward with the money they retain from the Government to cut off this road from the Pacific. They think they have succeeded in this, and they are now pressing still further and asking permission to reach El Paso. From this point they can connect with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road upon the north or the Galveston road upon the south, or both, and thus cut off the Texas Pacific on the east. They are maneuvering, too, for a connection from Ogden to Umatilla that will cut off the Northern Pacific on the east, and at the same time they are striving to secure for their San Francisco and Portland road a passage through the only pass in the Cascade Mountains, and thus strangle the Northern Pacific on the west. At the same time they have bought up or combined with the Pacific steamship lines, which enables them to charge their own prices upon freight and travel to the Pacific.

This great corporation which was warmed into life and nurtured into strength by Government aid; which refuses to pay 5 per cent. of its net earnings as required by law; which fails to make any provision to meet its rapidly accumulating debts while its stockholders grow rich on its earnings; which in times past is said to have invaded both Houses of Congress, placing its money where it would seduce our Christian statesmen; whose organization is as perfect as the ancient order of Jesuits; whose extortions on the public are intolerable; whose agents, spies, and pimps infest every corner of Washington and pollute the very air of the Capitol, is here by its hirelings to ask that no aid shall be given to the Texas and Pacific Railway. Sir, the effrontery of this demand, its injustice to others, and its cold-blooded selfishness should awake the Congress and the country to the iniquity of those who make it. If Congress has created such a monster it is but its plain duty to throw every barrier in its way to prevent its further accumulation of power and to place every safeguard it can around the people to protect them from its extortions. There is no better way to do this than by aiding in the construction of another, shorter, and cheaper, competing line to the Pacific coast. We have learned wisdom from the past, and we can place, as we have placed, such restrictions in this bill as shall enable us to guard and protect the interests of the people against the extortion of a soulless corporation. They come with a proposition so delusive and so fair in appearance that it has deceived some even of our southern friends Their bill introduced by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] and advocated by Mr. Huntington before our committee set out with a conclusion, reached by a doubtful if not erroneous construction of law, that the Texas and Pacific has forfeited its contract. With this excuse it modestly proposes to take the whole Government land grant from the Texas and Pacific and build its road from the west to terminate at El Paso, six hundred miles from any southeastern connection.

This bill gave to Mr. Huntington and his associates complete control of the Pacific coast, but gave to the Government no control over the rates of his roads. It robs the Texas and Pacific of its entire land grant from the Government and yet gives us no connection with his road. If the Texas and Pacific should be unable or unwilling under these circumstances to build any farther west across a desert country, of what value would the Southern Pacific be to us? It might be a splendid feeder to the Central or it might connect with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road, but it would be of no earthly value to the Southern States. And the Government, which has given one hundred and seventeen millions in subsidies to the road on the forty-first parallel and forty-six millions to the road on the forty-seventh, is asked to take from the road on the thirty-second parallel the small sum of eighteen millions of acres of land which she promised to give. The bill has since been amended by the minority of our committee, who say their bill does not meet the wishes of this corporation; but objectionable features still remain.

Sir, to my mind a more monstrous and iniquitous proposition could not be invented. If the Southern Pacific, which means but the Central Pacific, has the financial ability to build its road to meet the Texas and Pacific, whence does this ability come? The ground upon which Government aid was first asked for a Pacific railroad was that private capital could not accomplish it and would not undertake to build it. A land grant of immense value was given, and still the road could not be built. A subsidy of fifty-seven millions was granted for thirty years, on terms that bind the Government to the payment of interest, secured by a first mortgage to the Government, and this was not sufficient. The Government was then postponed, in its right, to a second mortgage, to enable the road to be built. If now the Southern or Central Pacific has the financial ability to build another road upon a land grant alone, the subsidies of the Government have conferred that power upon it. Shall we, then, not only add to that power, but take away from another competing corporation the little we have given, that it may be crushed?

Sir, leaving out of view any question of vested right in the Texas Pacific, is it right? Is it honest? Is it fair? Opposition to monopolies has ever been a cardinal principle in the democratic party, and yet men calling themselves democrats are willing upon a plea of economy to build up this monopoly, already the most powerful in the Government if not in the world. The law of primogeniture, which gave to the eldest son his father's whole estate, was always abhorrent to the American idea of justice, and yet now, when the same question comes up between two corporations, both the creatures and children of this Government, we are asked to give everything to the older and take from the younger even that which it has. We are asked to take from a corporation which has exhausted its private resources in building a portion of its road and extend favor to another whose road has been built with Government means, whose net income is $6,000,000 per annum and which yet refuses to pay interest on its Government debt. If it cannot pay this interest it is but fair to presume that it cannot build another road upon a land grant alone and that the offer to do it is a delusion and a snare. If it can pay it and will not, we have the spectacle of a great corporation which has been fostered by the Government refusing to do equity to it and yet asking that another franchise shall be given to it by the same Government, that it may be still more powerful and defiant.

We have but recently heard its officers boldly proclaiming that the Union and Central Pacific roads would not be worth the first mortgage at the maturity of their bonds and yet we have seen them resisting by all the means in their power the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of their just debts.

We know that the earnings of the Central Pacific have been used in the construction of the Southern Pacific. We have heard the denial that the Central has any interest as a corporation in the Southern, but we at the same time have heard the admission that the owners of the Central are the construction company of the Southern. Another Credit Mobilier scheme, by which another railroad is to be swallowed up by the same individuals. If these parties are permitted to build the Southern Pacific to El Paso, one of two things must necessarily result: either it will not be a competing line to the Central, and hence of no practical value to the country, or, if a competing under their management, it would be used to so cripple the Central that the Government money therein will be utterly lost. No honest competition between the roads can be expected with both under the same direction, and no confidence can be placed in a corporation whose every effort has been to swindle and defy the people.

The agents of this corporation, who dog the steps of members of Congress and eavesdrop private conversations to retail them to their masters, with artful cunning and malignancy attempt to inflame the northern mind against the Texas Pacific by denouncing it as a southern steal, and then with equal adroitness they seek to prejudice southern members against it with the sneer and insinuation that it is not a southern enterprise, but one intended for the benefit of Philadelphia and its great railroad king, Tom Scott. These arguments, presented from different stand-points to affect the views of different men, are the best evidence we could adduce to show the national character and importance of the road. It is a southern enterprise, and will greatly enhance the value of the impoverished railroad system and the desolated fields of the South, yet it will no doubt equally benefit Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and other portions of the Union; and perhaps it may greatly benefit that individual who is held up as a bugbear whenever the Texas and Pacific Railroad is mentioned. But, sir, whether it help Tom Scott or Tom Collins is a matter of no consequence to me. There is no contract this Government can make, no business it can undertake, that will not be subject to the very same objection and that will not confer some special benefit on some particular individual. The appointment by the Doorkeeper of the House of a laborer to sweep the Halls of Congress, the lowest, perhaps, of the Government appointments, is often sublet by the appointee to another who does the work for half the pay. It is idle, therefore, to urge such an objection as this to a work of great national importance.

PRESIDENTIAL ASPIRANTS.

But, Mr. Speaker, it has been intimated and even asserted that the interests of the democratic party and of those who aspire to be its candidates for the Presidency require that a democratic House shall grant no subsidies to this or any other southern improvement. Sir, I am a democrat. I belonged to the democratic party in times past when many of the distinguished gentlemen now acting with us, and some of whom are opposed to this measure, were members of the old whig party. And when that party was advocating a general system of internal improvement by the General Government I was opposed to it because I could find no warrant of authority for it in the list of delegated powers granted by the States to the General Government. I remember with what tenacity the great body of the democratic party in the South adhered to these principles, and I have seen the consequences. I remember, too, that our democratic brethren in other parts of the Union had not the same scruples upon the subject of using the public money for internal improvements, and while we kept our scruples they kept the public money constantly employed in building up their section. And what has been the result? While $207,999,664.77 of public money have been expended up to 1873 in what is now called subsidies by the Government, less than nineteen millions have been expended in the South. Magnificent custom-houses have been erected in the North and East; splendid post-offices and court-houses have been built; rivers and harbors have been cleaned out; breakwaters, canals, and railroads have been constructed; steamship lines and fisheries have been heavily subsidized; and Hell Gate passage has been blown out with an explosion second only to that which some members make on this floor whenever an appropriation is suggested that looks to the development of the South. On the other hand, when you look south of Mason and Dixon's line you see a custom-house at New Orleans the condition of which, after many years of driveling delay, is a disgrace to the country, and a mint which the other day was refused an appropriation to put it in working order. You look to Memphis, in a region where the best of ship-timber can be found, a region from which England and France are now drawing large supplies of the best white-oak timber, and you see the ruins of a desolated navy-yard on the banks of the Mississippi River, the greatest natural highway for internal commerce in the world. And this Mississippi River itself, upon which should now be floating the commerce of every nation, has been neglected and almost abandoned to the freaks of nature; a river which has been shown by Government survey to have an average depth of eight-five feet from Cape Girardeau to Vicksburgh, and of one hundred and fifteen feet from Vicksburgh to New Orleans; and yet we who live upon its banks have seen richly laden steamboats, drawing but seven and sometimes five feet of water, stuck fast for days and weeks and months and sometimes utterly wrecked on sand-bars in the middle of the stream. And so treacherous and uncertain are these shoals that the pilots on the river have been compelled, through a voluntary association, to leave written notices for each other at prominent points as they pass up and down to tell the latest movements of the shifting sands. Each steamboat, coal-barge, and flatboat that sinks and every tree that is torn from the bank and sunk in the river tends to form a new sand-bar, and it is just as essential to the safe navigation of the river that these obstructions should be removed at once as it is essential to the good health of a city that scavengers should instantly remove the dead carcasses that fall in its streets. We need dredge-boats sufficient to mobilize the sands of every prominent bar; we need snag-boats sufficient to remove these obstructions at once; and in many places we need low-water jetties or wing-dams to deflect the current from the caving banks and to throw it on the sand-bars to scour them out; and yet if we ask for a proper appropriation to do this work, or to build levees upon the banks, which are but high-water jetties, to confine the vast volume of water at high tide in a single channel that it may go sweeping with dredging power to the sea, we are met with the same fierce cry of subsidy. Such shameful neglect, and such failure to perfect by the aid of science this great highway of nature, and the pitiful appropriations that have been made for its improvement, are a crime against civilization and a disgrace to the commercial genius of the United States. And when we turn from our great river to our railroad; when we say that the Government has built one railroad to the Pacific, and that another is now demanded, not only to equalize the appropriations of the Government, but to give to the great and growing trade of the Pacific another outlet to the Atlantic over a competing line that will be free to the world from extortion, and that will not be impeded by the snows of winter, we are met by the same deafening cry of subsidy.

It is true that in times past the democratic party as a party was opposed to a general system of internal improvements by the General Government; but we must remember that the democratic party of to-day is not composed alone of the democrats of the past, for many a gallant whig who believed in Mr. Clay's general system of internal improvements by the General Government is now enrolled in our ranks. In truth the democratic party of the South has for years past had but one great, controlling, all-absorbing principle in national politics, and that was the great principle of local self-government. That question has now been settled. The military encampments which, to the disgrace of the Union, were pitched in the State-houses of Louisiana and South Carolina have been broken up and the last armed soldier who was sent South to intimidate democratic voters has been withdrawn. Whether this was accomplished by the bold action of a democratic House in refusing money to the Army to invade a State or by the scruples of a conscientious President who had sworn to support the Constitution it is unnecessary now to decide. The question has been settled and we are now ready to consider another. The gifted orator of Ohio [Mr. EWING] well said:

> It is characteristic of republican governments that the people confine their attention and interest to one great question until it is thoroughly settled, and now that the last of the southern questions is happily settled by the triumph of the democratic principles of local self-government, there looms up as paramount in importance and interest the question of debt and the currency.

When this question of the currency is settled—and it is now settled so far as this House is concerned—what next shall loom up into paramount importance?

To us of the South and West the next great question of importance is our own material development. We want the Mississippi River deepened until sea-going vessels can load at Saint Louis, Cairo, and Cincinnati. We want to see the trade of China pouring from San Francisco and San Diego, not only through Saint Louis and Chicago to Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, but at the same time through Vicksburgh, Memphis, and New Orleans, by the shortest route across the continent to the Atlantic at Savannah, Charleston, and Norfolk. To accomplish this the aid of the Government must be extended to us, and, if the theory of our anti-resumption friends is correct, the millions of currency which have been withdrawn from circulation should be reissued and appropriated for this purpose. If they are in earnest in the declarations they make about giving relief to the laboring classes, if they wish to see the circulation increased and at the same time give value to every dollar that is issued, let them join us in our efforts to build up the waste places of the South. Let all the idle workingmen be gathered together and put to work on the Mississippi levees and the Texas and Pacific Railroad, and then every dollar that is issued to pay them will not be an inflation of currency without value, but will represent the value of a day's labor that has been added to the aggregate wealth of the nation. A debt contracted in the destruction of values, as our present debt was, is a burden and a curse to a people; but a debt contracted for valuable improvement and remunerative property, whether contracted by an individual or a State, brings with it blessings and prosperity. Incur debt, then, if you choose, for these valuable improvements, and the blessings of prosperity will be felt throughout the land. Build up the waste places of the South, give tone and vigor to that portion of the body-politic which has been emaciated and enfeebled by the ravaging disease of war, and the currency which has accumulated at the money centers, with stifling effect upon trade, like blood unnaturally forced to the heart, will again be gently diffused through the paralyzed limbs, until the South will once more stand erect and become the joyful recipient and lavish purchaser of the products and fabrics of the North and West. Your horses, your mules, your corn, your meat, your wagons, your plows, your clothing, your furniture, your wine from the vine-clad hills, yes, and your whisky from the distilleries, whether crooked or straight, will find a ready market among our hungry, naked, and thirsty population.

But shall these things be done for us, and, if not, why? If it fails to be done our southern members will be largely responsible for the failure. Enough northern men, without regard to party, will, as they always have where northern improvements were concerned, cling together, and the Northern Pacific will be carried through. Notwithstanding your anti-subsidy resolution, passed by two-thirds of this House, the subsidies to the Northern Pacific will be renewed and extended for ten years. The grant of lands in this case will secure the building of the road. It runs through a magnificent agricultural country, and the demand for the lands will accomplish the purpose. The Government, as we know, built the Union and Central and filled Minnesota, Iowa, and Kansas with branches, and southern men will sit by and see the Northern Pacific built in the same way, while perhaps the Texas Pacific may be defeated. Hugging the mutilated body of State rights to their bosoms, agonizing over the fossil remains of the resolutions of '98 and '99, exhausting their energies over picayune reductions in the appropriations and expenditures, they will see their section left in poverty and want while the tide of wealth and empire rolls over the Northern States. Sir, I mourn over such representatives as Bulwer mourned over the bright classmate of his college days whom he found in after years a poor curate delving into the roots of the Greek language, or, as he expressed it, "wasting the energies of an immortal soul over the effete particles of a dead language." To those who fear a second Credit Mobilier, I say that to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and the same or a similar fraud can never be practiced on the same people twice. To those who have constitutional scruples, I say look to the established practice of the Government.

The precedents followed for years of giving Government aid to internal improvements have been too frequent and too long continued to be questioned now. The learning of our State-rights fathers might be and is most excellent reading for the student of history and the philosophy of government, and would furnish valuable texts for those who would preach or weep over what the States might have been if preserved in their original rights. But in this day of centralization, when men are made citizens of the United States without being citizens of any particular State, this day of fast-mail routes and letter-carriers, when Government officials converse with each other through telephones, when there are one hundred thousand Federal office-holders, when the poor of every State, male and female, are flocking to the Capitol asking for work and begging for bread, when charities are dispensed to suffering cities from the public Treasury, when centennial celebrations and Paris expositions are promoted by direct appropriation, it is ridiculous and absurd to talk about a want of constitutional power in the Government to lend its aid to construct a great artificial channel of commerce whose cloud of smoke by day and whose pillar of fire by night leads the advancing host of civilization. The power to do this has been too long exercised to be denied now, and power once assumed is seldom abandoned except through revolution.

If, then, we of the South are a part of this Union, we ask in the name of justice and humanity an equal distribution of its governmental aid. If our "poor petition" is to be spurned, if our rights are to be denied to us, and by our democratic friends, the sooner we know it the better. When we believed the success of the republican party meant the destruction of every cherished right we possessed, we were solid for the democratic party which struggled to shield us from this oppression. We felt that we owed a debt of gratitude to the gallant men who by skill and ingenuity in parliamentary tactics and by physical endurance seldom equaled had saved us from the merciless persecution that would have followed the passage of the force bill, and we were determined to pay that debt not only to the party in general but to our distinguished Speaker in particular, who had borne a conspicuous part in that struggle. We have paid it, and the bonds which now bind us together are bonds of sympathy and love, bonds which I trust may never be rudely shaken and bonds which I pray may never be broken.

But, sir, if we are to be treated as orphans in the house of our fathers, if we are to be told to hush every time we ask for anything lest we jeopardize the aspirations of presidential candidates, if an alliance with us is to be deemed one of doubtful respectability, if prominent democrats in order to maintain their positions in the national democratic party must be constantly shaking their skirts clear from southern improvements, if, in short, we are to be but hewers of wood and drawers of water, then I say to gentlemen that unity of interest makes unity of sentiment, and unity of sentiment is the foundation-stone of political organization. The solid South may still be solid, and I hope she may, for the democratic party, but in my judgment it will be solid for that man and that portion of the party which recognizes her States as tenants in common, and not as tenants at sufferance with their sisters, and which is ready to receive her sons into full fellowship in this great American brotherhood.

APPENDIX.

And just here permit me to show what subsidies have been extended by the Government to other improvements:

Subsidies for the last ten years of the United States.

Statement exhibiting land concessions by Congress to States and corporations for railroad purposes, from 1850 to 1876—Continued.

* No evidence of the construction of any part of these roads having been filed in the General Land Office, the grants are presumed to have lapsed, but the lands have not been restored, and Congress has taken no action in the matter.

† Lands declared forfeited by Congress.

Statement showing the amount of bonds, payable thirty years from date, issued to the Pacific railway companies, with the interest, at 6 per cent., paid and due thereon, at the close of the business of the Treasury Department, December 30, 1876.

GOVERNMENT LOAN TO HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, want and destitution and hunger are abroad in this land. Men, women, and children die daily from starvation. In the midst of all our apparent prosperity, still there is a degree of suffering among the poorer classes of our people that calls upon us for relief, immediate and substantial relief. Speculative theories, and hopes to be realized from legislation, with a favorable prospective future, will not do; it is present material aid, it is bread, that the half-starved multitudes demand. "Employment or bread." It was this motto inscribed upon the banners of five thousand men recently in line in the city of San Francisco, and such was the device upon the banners of like multitudes of people in the Middle and Eastern States. "Give us employment or give us bread." Strong and fearful language. Paris upon an occasion heard it. The sequel I need not mention; that is history.

The nature of the bill under consideration is not merely for present relief, but also the commencement of a policy which is designed to place the agricultural interest of the country where it properly belongs, and that is above any other branch of the public industries. The bill proposes to make a loan of $500 by the Government to any citizen of the United States, or the head of a family, who has goods and effects under the value of $300, and who makes an entry on the public domain under what is known as the homestead law of the 20th May, 1862, this loan to be secured by mortgage upon the homestead, payable during the term of ten years, in annual installments, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum; the amount of the loan to be made to the settler in five monthly payments; proof to be taken by the Register of the Land Office, in the locality of the land so entered, that the money received on the receipt of each installment has been expended in improvements before the succeeding one will be made; the law to expire by limitation when $10,000,000 have been advanced in the manner provided.

These are the main features of the bill. The objections made to its passage are, first, its unconstitutionality; and secondly, that it is inexpedient and improper legislation. It is a difficult matter to determine what is, and what is not, constitutional legislation. Under the clause of "providing for the general welfare" Congress has done a great many strange things, all of which have been submitted to. It has divided among the States large sums of money, the products of the sale of the public lands; granted millions upon millions of dollars to railroads, corporations, and Credit Mobiliers, as well as vast territories of the choicest lands of our domain; granted lands to States and Territories for the endowment of schools, colleges, charitable and religious institutions; granted alms to foreign nations in the hour of famine, subsidies to ocean steamers and in violation of the letter of the Constitution which provides that nothing but gold and silver shall be a legal tender, Congress has enacted and the courts affirmed that certificates and bills of credit are gold and silver; and now a scheme is in contemplation to grant to the States and Territories the unsold and unoccupied lands within their several limits.

It therefore seems that Congress has the constitutional power, to judge from its past acts, to grant money and land for almost any purpose, but has not the power to make a small loan, repayable with interest at 3 per cent. per annum, to a half-starved laboring-man. It is thought better that some corporation should enjoy the gift, and make large profits out of such gifts, than to loan a tithe to our suffering people. They will do to fight our battles and erect our public works; but the idea of a small loan secured by mortgage is a monstrous idea, the conception of imbecility and advocated by madmen. And so much for the constitutionality of the measure.

Now, as to the inexpediency and impropriety of the adoption of the principle contained in the bill.

I am one of those who believe that the time has come for a change of base in our legislation, that the rights of man are to be considered as well as incorporated wealth, that the day has come when class legislation should be forever abolished, or so curtailed and diminished in its demands as not to subordinate all other subjects of legislation. Labor should have its share of the benefits resulting from legislation; and because it bears the humble name of labor it should not be excluded from the mind of the law-makers. An eminent writer has well said that "the history of labor is only second in importance to the history of knowledge." The assertion is true. It cannot be controverted. I shall therefore consider the question of labor, and speak of the demands that this class, embracing as it does nine-tenths of our entire population, has upon the consideration of Congress. We in this Hall are their Representatives; we are their servants; by their suffrages we occupy these seats.

While it may be said that Congress is the legislative branch of a Union of States, the very document that confers this title commences with the words "we, the people."

It does not become me so much to complain of what has been done during the last twenty years by Congress, as what was omitted to be done. It is well understood, however, that there have been very few laws enacted for the general welfare of the people. Class legislation has been the rule, and legislation for the benefit of the workingmen of the nation the exception.

Aside from the passage of the homestead act in the Thirty-third Congress, I am not aware that anything has been done which directly affected the popular interests. By popular interests I mean those which relate to the workingmen of the country—individual interests; not class. Congress has dealt with a degree of liberality toward the corporations, and those who represented the capital of the country, to an extent that almost challenges our belief when we contemplate the vast largesses. To the demands of those favored classes the door of the Treasury has been unlocked to them, and the choicest parts of the public domain have been ceded to them, as though it were the owner of the land and the money voluntarily bestowed. It is the people who own the public moneys and the public lands, not Congress.

The grants of lands to corporations during the two last decades will not fall short of two hundred millions of acres; and the subsidies to incorporated railroad companies, Credit Mobiliers, and other favorites will not fall short, during the same time, of a hundred and fifty millions of dollars. Under what clause of the Constitution these acts were done, honest judges and impartial lawyers may look for in vain. The broad mantle of the "general welfare" will not cover this usurpation of the laws. But it has been done, and let the sleep of oblivion await it. There is no remedy for past mismanagement. I suppose it will be repeated, and by the present Congress, too. But, in my judgment, the Texas Pacific has greater claims for consideration than any of the railroad schemes which have preceded it, and more especially for the reason that it will benefit a portion of the people of the country who have not been recipients of any part of the immense subsidies that have already been granted. But will this reason justify the project of legislation on our files?

Let me inquire, sir, in what way the masses of our people have been benefited by this system of legislation. They are fast reaching the conclusion that Congress is a legislative body whose chief employment has been the division of money among a favored class. They reason, and with much consistency too, that, while they are the owners of the public lands and money, they are of not sufficient account even to be consulted. The great agricultural interest, the facilities of raising corn, and herds of cattle, and which should be of the first importance in the policy of government, are subjects of secondary importance. The argument has been held out that these immense subsidies have been granted with a view to the development of the resources of the country. But the capital of the country and corporate powers have been infinitely more benefited than the masses. These privileged persons are to-day surrounded with all the comforts and luxuries of life, while the masses of no civilized country on the globe are in a more depressed condition than this. If anything is manifest it is the startling fact that a large number of the American people are in a state of personal financial difficulties, and millions of them in absolute poverty.

Through a false system our laboring-men have been concentrated in bodies about our cities, large towns, mining and manufacturing districts, engaged in different industries, which for some cause having failed, the employés have necessarily been discharged and thus thrown upon the charity of their more prosperous neighbors. Had these laboring-men been encouraged by assistance of the Government and placed upon the public lands they would have been thrifty people in the place of wandering mendicants, as hundreds and thousands of them are. And thus we find, at this time, in consequence of the depression of the mining, manufacturing, commercial, and other industrial pursuits, thousands of men out of employment, men who are ready and willing to labor but can find no employment.

It is stated upon what may be regarded as reliable authority that there are at this time two millions of our people who can find no work to do. Deep and gloomy distress covers the land. There are in the city of Philadelphia eight thousand tenants who cannot pay rent; there are ten thousand houses that are empty. In that city alone there are five thousand persons in the penitentiaries, houses of refuge, of correction, and public charities. I speak of a single city. Apply these statistics to other large cities and towns throughout the United States, and you have a grand total of people restrained of their liberty that no enlightened country can begin to approach. Outside of this Chamber, everywhere your eye rests upon want, nay, squalid, repulsive poverty. It is limited to no particular place; it is everywhere. You may see it on your daily approach to this Hall; you have seen it on your way to and from your homes and about them when there. Strong, stout men in rags begging for employment; small children, wandering over the streets, from house to house, pinched with famine and shivering in the cold blasts. These things you meet with every day. There is famine around us, and thousands upon thousands of people are in the most destitute condition, but who still live; but how? Heaven may know but mortal men do not.

I commenced reading the horrors that were recently disclosed in some of the tenement houses of New York, but the disgusting details I involuntarily laid aside. Tell me, sir, what is to be done with the countless multitude who are out of employment and who earnestly and prayerfully seek it in vain? They are our children by birth or adoption. They demand and should have our care and protection. Heretofore we have sent our ships freighted with corn to Greece, to Ireland; and should the prayer come up from China, even there would our charities extend. Far as our navies bear the nation's flag, there our sympathizing hearts go.

Are we not prepared to realize want and destitution so near us, among our own people? The Queen of England has given her famishing subjects in India forty millions sterling during the last year. Shall our generosity to our own people be questioned? Shall our charity which warms up for others' woes in other lands be chilled in the midst of our own people? This state of things we all see. We know it to be so. With one responsive voice all say that "something must be done." What? That something to be done in several States that have come to my notice is the enlargement of the prison walls, the addition of houses of refuge, of charities, and corrections! What a remedy! What sagacity! What philanthropy! "Something must be done to relieve the wants and necessities of the people." Nothing speculative, I hope, and which depends upon the contingencies certain legislation may produce; nothing promised, in the employment that public works may hold out; nothing resulting from tariff laws or currency, greenbacks or the remonetized silver dollar. All these measures have met my hearty support. No, something more must be done or these starving multitudes must either live in destitution or commit acts of desperation.

Lord Bacon has wisely said:

> The way to prevent seditions is to remove the cause of them; for if there be fuel prepared, it is hard to tell whence the spark shall come that shall set it on fire.

The scenes of the past show but too plainly the agitation of the multitude. They meet, they resolve, they return to their homes; that is, what may be called homes. Abiding-places only. Few of the comforts of life. These have, in thousands of cases, been pawned for bread. The sign of the three golden balls tells where the tenement traps are.

If something is to be done, what shall it be? Do not deal in generalities, but do "something!" In the first place acknowledge by some public act of this body that Congress has a willing ear to listen to these popular complaints and that the toiling people have as strong a claim upon us as any privileged class. "Do something" in a substantial way that they may know we are not unmindful of their wants. Be it never so small, do "something!" Show them that we are their friends. That we are the Representatives of the people. That what we have to give, is theirs, not ours. The great Roman orator, when consul, in his instructions to his brother, who was governor of the province of Asia Minor, says:

Apply yourself, therefore, with all your spirit and all your zeal to that plan which you have already practiced; that of loving the people, protecting them in every way, and desiring that they should be as happy as possible.

If these sentiments in the ruler were wise and good two thousand years ago, then they are to-day. If the doctrine applied to a semi-monarchy was sound, how much more so in a more enlightened age and where the masses are better qualified to judge as to the character and extent of their rights. Our people have seen you add five thousand men to the rank and file of the Army since Congress met at an additional cost of five millions a year; they have seen you give liberal appropriations to all the branches of the Government; they have seen you commission men and furnish money to an exhibition in a foreign land; all this they have seen. Now let them see that you are willing "to do something" for them. Give them evidence at least of a friendly disposition. Let them see by your acts that your thoughts are with them, and that they are recognized as a part and parcel of this Government.

And what shall be done? Turn your eye to God's great farm of fifteen hundred million acres, unoccupied save by wild and savage beasts that roam over it, and by as wild and savage men. There is space enough to provide comfortable homes for all the unemployed and suffering men in this broad land. To place them there and loan them a few dollars for pressing temporary wants is, however, an unconstitutional and impolitic act. The Constitution! There are not threads enough left in it to stop the flight of a sparrow. Its disguised features cannot be recognized by the eye of an honest statesman. It is among the things of the past. The public domain holds out its arms, inviting laboring-men to come. Class, says the Constitution, is in the path that leads there. It is a shelter for savage men, and a largess in reserve for incorporated wealth.

"Westward ho!" should be the motto on the banners of the exodus of the working masses. It is the great field reserved for their present wants and necessities. If men of small means cannot go there with their families, grant them aid. Better hire them at the public cost to go there and cultivate this field than to suffer it to remain vacant. How infinitely more appropriate than to put the money in prison walls and solitary cells. People must live; the craving demands of nature know no law. Labor and land should go together.

Elihu Burritt, in a letter published a few days ago, uses the following strong language:

Nature has also a political economy founded on revealed and eternal laws which neither monarchies nor republics can violate with impunity. "What God has joined together let no man put asunder" is an injunction of wider sweep than the intimate relationships of human society. The law that joins together man and woman in conjugal life rests on the same basis of necessity as the law that joins together labor and land. In the first days of the creation these were so intimately united in the motive of its very existence that the only reason then revealed for making man was that he should subdue and till the earth, which was formed and fitted for this express purpose. The two cannot be put asunder by any human policy without incurring the consequences of a violated law in loss and suffering. Nor can they be kept asunder, or their union be prevented, without the penalty that follows a sin of omission. Whoever travels over the wild or thinly peopled regions of the earth will see what comes of keeping asunder labor and land. And on no other continent can this deplorable consequence be more strikingly seen than on the public domain of this country.

There is no other country in the world where so much labor and so much land are kept asunder as in the United States. And millions upon millions of our people are deeply feeling the penalty of this violation of the law of God and nature. Until our Government does works meet for repentance of the infraction of this law no political or financial reform can lift the nation out of the bog of its present condition. It is in vain for us to expect this condition will emerge to the hard footing and happy sunlight of permanent prosperity unless the Government puts its shoulder to the wheel in a strong, bold measure; unless it ceases to hold asunder what God and nature have joined together, or the best labor and the best land ever given to a nation. Hunger has sharp teeth, and will not only "eat through stone walls," but something harder still. It has more than once eaten through the procrustean adamant of a political economy which science had claimed should never yield to the sudden or abnormal necessities of humanity.

But it seems a sin against nature even that we should have this labor famine upon hundreds of thousands of able-bodied men on the verge of starvation, with half a continent unpeopled and uncultivated—belonging to the nation. We may depend upon it that the teeth of hunger in this country are as sharp as in Ireland or India. They will eat through the walls of that political economy which our National Government and State governments have made so impregnable to labor and so yielding to capital. Up to the present both these legislative powers have talked and acted as if they were yielding to a dangerous heresy to loan labor a dollar or provide for it employment even for the public good. Where it has asked bread, or a chance to earn it, they have given it a stone. But to incorporated capital it has said, "Seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you." And it has sought and knocked, and the Treasury of the nation and its vast landed estate have been opened wide to satisfy its unscrupulous greed. One hundred and twenty millions of the choicest acres of our public domain have been given to the Pacific railways, and millions upon millions of dollars, in the form of guaranteed bonds, which they are unable or unwilling to pay, either principal or interest. How remarkable, that a Government that pretends to any honest perception of justice should have two such opposite codes of economy—one for capital, the other for labor.

The great man who can read forty languages indulges in the picture which will attend the workingmen who enter upon the almost limitless domain:

They would give to the cold and barren poverty of unpeopled regions the warmth and wealth of permanent and coherent populations. They would make a wilderness lying in costly silence and idleness "to blossom as the rose." They would fill it with the merry music of Sabbath bells and of human industry. Nature itself would sing for joy at the bans of labor and land, so long kept asunder by a policy opposed to the fundamental laws and motives of the creation.

And is it not a wonder that this aged philosopher has not been denounced by the editors of some subsidized newspapers as a fool and an idiot for uttering the sentences quoted, and which probably are far beyond their comprehension?

The cultivation of the soil should be the occupation of the great majority of the people of this country. Agriculture should be the theme of our growing population. It means industry. When Adam wended his way sulkily out of the gates of Eden, he went under the command to "cultivate the earth and subdue it and to earn his bread in the sweat of his brow." If there is on the face of the globe a country which was made and shaped for the culture of the soil as the chief occupation of the people inhabiting it it is this. Talleyrand saw it in the beginning of this century and boldly remonstrated with his master, the great Napoleon, when the deeds of cession were exchanged for the Louisiana Territory. "Sire," said the minister, "you have parted with a territory sufficient to sustain a population of fifty millions of people, with everything that is needed by civilized man."

Within the limits of that grant of land, the purchase of which was the crowning act of Mr. Jefferson's life, the entire population of this Union to-day could be supported and sustained with all the absolute necessaries of life.

Agriculture will be the secret of our success in the great future. This country was not designed for commerce or manufactures. So much of these as are necessary for the promotion of the others are right and proper; but agriculture must be king! Labor and land must go together. Here is a broad field. It has all the elements of grandeur and power. Venice is the Venice it was when Shylock was upon 'change at the Rialto demanding his "usance." The foundations of Carthage, commercial mistress of the world, are gone, and the spot where she stood is unknown. London, on a small island in the sea, will live and flourish, but it will have limits to its commercial trade; commerce is its life. Not so with this great, broad, and capacious land. Its fields are boundless, its productions without a parallel; and there will be no limits to our greatness and prosperity unless a stupid and blind policy shall attempt to make the pursuits of the country what God never designed that they should be.

And here comes in the propriety of doing that in a time of general distress which will not only relieve the wants and pressing necessities of more than a million of laboring-men, who seek employment but cannot find it, and which will be in furthering the very measure that will benefit the whole country, and which it is its destiny sooner or later to attain. Let the cultivation of the soil be the absorbing idea. Implant this in the mind of our youths, that the cultivation of the soil is, after all, the occupation of honor; that in the pursuit of this there is a steady and certain progress; that it is not attended with the changes and fluctuations that surround the manufactories, the mines, and the mills. "Go West, young man," was the sound advice of Horace Greeley. Why go West? Because there was the open field for his labor, and he would necessarily leave behind him the vices and dens that too often afford welcome and shelter in our dense populations.

"Go West," let us say to the men who are out of employment to-day and whose necessities have not yet led them to the commission of crime. Men must live, and if the bread of life cannot be obtained by labor or charity, it will be taken in violation of the law. This is human experience. How much better to assist the poor man, with his family, to live in health and comfort than to enlarge your penitentiaries with a view of locking him up there, when you have refused him aid and he is forced to steal or commit highway robbery through sheer want and destitution.

Let ours be the course of wise men, and talk and reason with them. Mind, this is a Government of the people. They must be heard. Let our peace offering be this bill or any other which may meet the opinion of Congress of a kindred nature.

The passage of the bill before the House will open up the highway to a multitude of men, and the money that may be necessary to carry out the scheme will be worth a million times more than the boasted millions lavishly dealt out to Credit Mobiliers. The custody of the public moneys is a sacred trust. The manner in which much of it has been disposed of has created a feeling of deep popular disgust and indignation. It has not been distributed for the benefit of our toiling men. And can any one be so blinded to the fact as not to see the public effect this has produced? Say by your act in refusing to pass this bill that we cannot make a small loan to the distressed people of the country but can give immense sums of money to capital, and you will enkindle a flame of animosity and hatred.

Let the idea prevail that class legislation is to be preferred to equality to all, and how can you expect peace and quiet throughout the land? Legislate with a view to make labor honorable and inviting. Teach the multitude to embark in the noblest occupation of life, the cultivation of the soil. The vicious system that has made its way into the public mind of encouraging speculation, of bringing young men up to professions, crazing their heads with becoming stock-jobbers and bankers, and living by their wits instead of the labor of their hands, should be scouted from the popular arena. Land is the source of substantial wealth. Make the farm and the workshop a theme of ambition for the young, and let agriculture stand out as the chief employment of our people, so you will have prosperity and so you will prevent the disastrous failures which too often occur in pursuits where money is alone the moving cause.

Speculation and false credit and intrigues among the moneyed men of the nation have put us in the humiliating condition we are in to-day. Crime has become so common among those who have heretofore ruled the exchange that our name abroad has become a byword and a reproach. Let us, in the name of all that is sacred, farm more and bank less. Let us produce more and speculate less. Let us come down to the conclusion that the man whose hands are soiled by the implements of husbandry is quite as respectable as the man upon 'change.

Such are the ideas that I would press upon Congress; and to carry out the plan successfully let the people know that we are willing to treat them fairly, honorably, and that class legislation shall cease and determine forever. The produce of our western fields, tilled and cultivated by our own people, will be a better equilibrium of trade and regulator of currency than all your Wall street knowledge. Let the "corner" of the stock speculators become the fence-corner and your "puts, and calls, and straddles" give way to wheat and corn and grazing herds of cattle. This will be a guarantee of success—permanent success.

The agricultural interests of the country have been lost sight of, or, I would say, subordinated to the money power. It was the small farmers of France who put two thousand millions of francs into the public treasury to pay the debt of the Prussian war. That plainly exhibits to us the magnitude of rural pursuits in that republic. Our big field, unoccupied, could hold within its capacious limits three French territories and sustain with all the necessaries of life five French populations. The farming interests of continental Europe are the foundation of their wealth. Money has not made the sovereign deranged nor corrupted the masses of the people.

I believe that the Southern States of this Union are more prosperous to-day than any other part of it; that there is less crime there and less of destitution. Why? Because the southern people, having passed through the fiery ordeal of war and its calamities, have manfully accepted the situation and turned their attention to reclaiming the old plantation and by all classes yielding to a necessity, which will redound to their honor and establish their prosperity. Farming, sir, to-day is the almost universal occupation of the Southern States. Suppose that banking and exchange and stock-jobbing had been the ruling idea in the southern mind, would the present condition of the people be tolerable? The wisdom of the people there in looking to the soil for support has been far in advance of the Middle and Eastern States. To make a commencement, therefore, in turning the public mind to a sure and certain success, as well as to make some beginning in aiding poor, upright, and honest men in the location of a home upon our rich domain, I urge the passage of the bill I have introduced for the consideration of Congress.

We have already provided that the citizen shall have land to settle upon, free of cost. I was an advocate of that law in this House when it was enacted, a quarter of a century ago. But if you furnish him with land when he has neither the means to reach it nor money to build his hut and plant his first crop, the gift to him is of no avail. I would not make him a subsidy; I would make him a small loan, secured by mortgage upon the land he settles upon, to be repaid in ten years, at 3 per cent. In this way he can make his commencement available. He must have his home, his farming-implements, and his seeds to plant. If he gets through the first year of his adventure, with industry, he will be sure of success, and he can repay his loan. Suppose a few thousand dollars should not be repaid—a trifle compared with the millions you have granted as subsidies to incorporated wealth, and which you never expect to be repaid. In one case it is a large gift to the rich; in the other, a small loan to the poor and helpless. It is one of our duties to aid and assist our indigent people.

Cicero lays down the maxim that "Nature made us just, that we might share our goods with each other and supply each other's wants." You all admit that "something should be done." If the scheme I advocate does not come up to your idea of that something, name it. I have no pride of opinion. Provide a substitute, and I will heartily co-operate in any better measure that may look to the relief of a suffering people. I am totally indifferent to the abuse that has been heaped upon me for my advocacy and support of this bill. I can stand it all, if one poor human creature is benefited by my action.

Sometimes it is prudent and wise to be just. The unmistakable signs of the times indicate uneasiness and discontent. The element slumbers now, but it is an element of popular power, and will in some way find vent. Exhibit by your action a disposition to listen to the application that is forced upon us. Twenty-five thousand of the citizens of my own district have made their appeal to Congress for national aid. The cities of Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and other towns have joined in the request.

There are more than a hundred thousand petitioners to this Congress asking for aid, for the adoption of the principle contained in the present bill or some other measure of a like character. These petitions are all couched in respectful language.

The workingmen of the city of Washington, in their memorial to Congress, make use of the following strong but earnest and respectful language. They say:

> Shall not Congress consider well whether it is the part of wisdom for so great a country as ours to allow such suffering among the people, its own people, when there are ample means of prevention or at least alleviation? The workingmen of America are better entitled to the bounty of Government than aggregated wealth. The wealthy classes are in no need of the profuse liberality accorded to them. We too pay our taxes on all that we consume or wear. We fill the rank and file of the Army whenever required, and labor is the basis of all the national prosperity. We are in sore need, and are willing to leave the homes of our fathers and go to the distant wilds of the West; but we are compelled to request that you will give us a helping hand, as suggested in the bill of Mr. WRIGHT of the House of Representatives, which loan we are ready to be obligated, as set forth in the bill, to repay in the manner therein specified, principal and interest.
> Ready, willing, and eager to labor as we are, we cannot procure work and have exhausted our small savings, and a very large number of us are in a state of absolute want, and this in midwinter. There is no hope. The future is shrouded in darkness and gloom. We see no prospect of any change for the better.
> We submit that it cannot be the judgment of the patriotic and humane of either of your honorable Houses that the bayonet and the bullet are the only responses to be given to the collective shrieks of starving men, women, and children for only that "daily bread" for which all classes are so beseeching whenever they give utterance to the Lord's Prayer.

And this is the general tenor of the prayer of a hundred thousand men, whose appeal to your honor and justice lies upon your table. Are gentlemen aware of this fact? Have they not had time and leisure to look into the case, as exhibited by the files of the House? Will they not give heed to the supplications of this multitude of distressed and unhappy men—men on the verge of famine in a land of plenty? Have they no claim upon what belongs to them? We, their trustees only, have no legal right or authority to turn our eyes from the spectacle before us. Let us not, I pray, sit as the guests did around the board at Belshazzar's feast—blind to the handwriting upon the wall; insensible to the living fact that God is among us, but we know it not. Shall we listen to the appeal of the money-changers and turn a deaf ear to the toiling, hungry men of the land? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the Rothschilds and their agents in Wall street have had more power, during the last twenty years, in shaping the legislative measures of this Government than twenty millions of laboringmen. They have been a power superior to cabinets and Congress. They have openly made war on every measure of legislation that has not been for their immediate interest. They have shaped and molded our laws. They have framed our party creeds and platforms. They have been supreme at the capital. Recently they met with a rebuke. It is to be hoped it may be followed by like victories on the part of Congress. When Congress was recently debating and considering the silver bill, they undertook to dictate terms to this House; but we shivered their lance and knocked their buckler and shield to atoms. Their agents retired after the victory, to report to the money-changers in Wall street the reverses they had sustained, and to fulminate their bulletins through a subsidized press.

Thank God for that victory; it is a harbinger of better days, and an indication that Congress will have the courage to stand up manfully to its duty in the future.

The snake is scotched, if not killed.

These petitions and memorials which lie upon our table show a concentrated movement by the workingmen of the country. It is forced upon them by absolute necessity. It is a cry that cannot, nor should not, be appeased without relief. It comes up from the million; it is their action; and blistered be the tongue of the cringing sycophant who cries demagogue and communist to intimidate or dishearten the Representative who, in his place and acting under the solemnity of his oath and with conscientious motives, speaks for the oppressed people of this country. A hundred thousand freemen furnish me to-day with the patent of my authority. A hundred thousand men are pleading at the bar of this House for nothing that is unreasonable or unjust. [Applause.]

It is no part of my purpose to excite strife between labor and capital. But so long as I shall occupy a seat on this floor, I shall contend that labor is entitled to the same privileges with capital. No more; no less. Class has had the lion's share. Labor may now, with impunity, assert its claim. Land and labor will go together; and the partnership, in this country, should never be dissolved. When it is, then comes decay. The debt of this Government must be paid from the product of our soil and by labor. There are no revenues from the stock speculations and the gambling in gold and bills of exchange in Wall street, nor in banking or brokerage. The national debt must be paid out of the labor of the country and the generous yield of the soil.

The product of corn, sir, the past year the statistical tables put at fifteen hundred millions of bushels; three-fourths as many bushels as we owe dollars of the public debt; eight hundred millions of bushels of wheat. The wheat and the corn, the yield of the last year, would pay off the nation's debt. Compare this with the result of your "puts, calls, and straddles" of scheming money-changers and dealers in stocks! What do they produce that benefits the country in which they live? Labor and land must pay the debt and the accumulating interest. Corn, sir, and herds of cattle, and manual labor which produce them, are the country's sheet-anchor; your money-dealers and stock-jobbers, the veriest drones of the hive. And here comes in the argument why we should encourage our helpless workingmen to occupy the remnant of land that the greed of corporate power has not already gobbled up, that we may raise more corn and more cattle and cancel that debt which can be paid in no other way.

Of the eighteen hundred millions of acres of unoccupied land there is not 5 per cent. of it that comes under the head of agricultural land; of the remainder a small portion is irrigable, and the large part an arid and unproductive waste. I speak of the land west of the one hundredth meridian. East of that, and where the best lands are situate, the big corporations have sponged them up. They are the landed aristocracy. But what there is left should be sacredly held in trust for the people.

John Bright informs us that—

Nine hundred and twenty-five men own one-third of the land of Great Britain, or twenty millions of acres.

There the nobility hold one-third of the territory of a kingdom, and the power which this ownership confers upon them makes them the sovereign rulers of a kingdom. These railroad corporations of this country, with their thousands of miles of track and the twenty miles, in alternate sections, upon each side, the gift of Congress, hold a political power that is immense. It is more likely to be exercised for bad than good purposes. It is in sympathy with money. To these monster corporations wealth is the solitary main-spring; the rights of labor, nothing. What, in the opinion of the shareholders of these immense privileges, do personal rights and individual concerns amount to? To them labor is mean and insignificant; they have but one rule by which they measure human greatness; need I tell you what that is? Money, MONEY, MONEY! Compared with this, human life is but dross, if it be the life of the laboring-man. They live for themselves, and all that can be plundered from the public Treasury is right and proper in their sordid imagination.

Shall this state of things continue? Shall every session of Congress add more and more to their power and influence?

Let us stop to breathe and see if man, in this country, individual man, has not some political rights. Let us see if he is in want if we have not the courage to give him bread. England furnishes transportation to her poor people to go to her Indian possessions. America says idleness shall not be encouraged, and she goes to work to increase and enlarge her prisons. Builds new ones. Erects mad-houses. If these cannot contain the unfortunates then the bayonet is burnished up. Riots and mobs must be put down, and martial music drowns the cries and sobs of starving men, women, and children.

Tell me, Mr. Speaker, if it is not cruel and unjust to withhold our support when the case of need is so apparent in the land? How generous we are when capital comes up to this Hall and wants a few millions, a very few millions, for some purpose disguised under the name of the development of the country! It is hard work for labor to cross the threshold and make its entrance here. We cannot reward idleness. The laboring-man is told to go to work; but alas, sir, where can he find employment? There are thousands whose poverty prevents them from emigrating. Is it not the duty of the Government to give them material aid? True, the bill will provide for but comparatively a small number, but it will be the commencement of an exodus which will be followed up by others whose interests will be a motive to follow people who have the means, but must have associates when they reach the promised land. Our sense of justice, not our bounty, should send forward the pioneers. The idea that we should rely upon prisons to confine men driven to the commission of crime to save the vital spark of life is monstrous; the idea of subduing impoverished men demanding bread by the bayonet is abhorrent to the principles of humanity. This Government has the means and it is a crime to refuse relief. Be content for a season to suspend the payment of the principal of the public debt. For the present, under the depression of our industries, the payment of the interest is all that should be done. The holders of our bonds would have no right to complain. The holders of more than 50 per cent. of them bought them at fifty cents on the dollar. They have no equity as to time. They should be paid. It is the policy of a great government to do it. The time to pay the principal will be our pleasure to determine. And tell me, sir, why it is, in view of a sound position on the question of legislation, that the owners of the public bonds who are resident in and citizens of the United States should not be imposed with the duty of the payment of their shares in the common taxation of the country to raise money to pay the bonds which they hold? I grant you that "it is not so written in the bond," but the income arising from the bond is a subject upon which we may lay our hands, and which we will do if I am not mistaken in the temper and disposition of this House.

Labor is taxed. Labor makes its feeble contribution; but great, because small things are great things, in dollars and cents with the poor. Land is taxed, oppressively taxed, and so are trades and occupations, while the holder of the bonds escapes the burdens of government. Income it is said should not be taxed, because the mode of getting at it is inquisitorial. The feelings and delicate sensibilities of the bondholder are sacred. The only cow and the rustic furniture of the workingman may be exposed to public sale—nay, the very bed from under him—to satisfy the tax-gatherer; but he has no sensibilities, no feelings. He has no business to be poor. Let me go further, for I want to give some reasons that the man of toil may have for complaint and why his situation under our laws becomes worse and worse.

The examples he daily witnesses in the administration of justice are far from binding him stronger and stronger to his country. He does not see equal and even-handed justice administered. The big thief and plunderer of the public moneys; the man who, under the cloak of official place, may form leagues for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the Government of its revenues; the official persons who appropriate to themselves the trust-moneys of the widow and the orphan; the speculator who lives upon dishonest gains, receiving $10 a day and expending fifty in riot and debauch, till forgery and perjury and fraud close his career; these, if convicted of their offenses, find their way out of the felons' cells, because, through the money they have illegally procured and the fact of having a friend at court, the door with its grated bars is thrown open.

But the thief who steals a blanket to cover his shivering limbs from the cold blasts of winter, or a few articles of food to sustain life, enters the cells and the door is thrown open at the termination of his sentence. The popinjay travels upon the rail with a pass in his pocket. The laborer without money may make his headway over the frozen ground in the snows of winter as best he can. Under our system of class and partial legislation the laws against usury, which in the days of our fathers were regarded as an absolute necessity to protect the weak against the strong, have ceased to be upon the statute-book; they are considered by the stock-jobbers as the relics of an ignorant age. That terrible engine called progress has crushed out these disabling statutes. Shylock alive to day and upon 'change would be a man of renown and elicit the most marked attention. What a numerous progeny that worthy and conscientious old gentleman left behind him! What numbers of the family we have in this country of ours—both native and adopted! The usurer before the Reformation was, in some of the Eastern countries, made the victim of torture. The rule is reversed in the present century; the usurer now applies the torture to his poor and helpless debtor. And, to-day, the Wall street nabob is measured as to his high standing and exalted business reputation by his sharp and cunning practices and the largest rate of usury he can impose.

These examples, Mr. Speaker, which are daily before the eyes of the workingman, are not by any means calculated to increase his love of country; but when poverty and distress comes upon him it chafes him to desperation. He feels, and naturally so, that he is an inferior being, and can you wonder why it is that this class of our people, by thousands, in all parts of this Union parade in public processions? It has a meaning. Understand this; it has a meaning. Hugo informs us that Napoleon the Little ascertained, but too late, however, there was a meaning in it in France. I may not quote from Victor Hugo. It may be said he smells of the commune; but I shall. What I read pretty well illustrates things we see at home. He says:

M. Bonaparte has three hundred costly and useless horses; the fruits and vegetables of the national parks, castles, and gardens, which were royal in days of yore; he overflows; he said the other day, "all my carriages," as Charles V said, "all my Spains," and as Peter the Great said, "all my Russias." The nuptials of Gamache are at the Elysée. The steaks turn night and day before the bonfires; they consume there; there bills are published; they are the bulletins of the new empire. Six hundred and fifty pounds of meat a day. The Elysée will soon have a hundred and forty-nine cooks, like the château de Shoenbrun. They drink, they eat, they laugh, they banquet. One swims in all the abundance and in all the drunkenness. And the man of the people, the poor day laborer, whose work has failed, the workman in rags, with naked feet, to whom the summer brings no bread and the winter no wood, whose aged mother lies languishing upon a foul straw mattress, whose young daughter prostitutes herself at the corners of the streets to live, whose little children shiver with hunger, fever, and cold in the paltry lodging-houses in the Faubourg Saint Marceau, in the garrets of Rouen, in the cellars of Lisle, do they think of him? What becomes of him? What do they do for him? Die, dog!

Here is a picture of France. France within the last twenty years. Draw the parallel between France then and America now. Call the craving, exacting money power of America the little Napoleon of France, and the French "man of the people" the laboring-man of America, and you have it. Shall history repeat itself? That is the question. We shall see.

Do you accuse me of exaggeration as to the condition of the poor of this country at this moment? Let me refer you to tables—the prison statistics of my State.

I read from the recent report of the board of public charities of the State of Pennsylvania:

Convicts undergoing imprisonments in the State penitentiaries and county jails	5,547
Juvenile delinquents, children in the houses of refuge and reform prisons	631
Making a grand total of	6,178

old and young confined within prison walls in the State of Pennsylvania:

Persons in almshouses of cities, boroughs, and townships	9,188
Poor people receiving "out-door relief"	17,030
Making a poor-list in the State of	26,218
To this add insane and idiotic	4,607

What made them so? The State, therefore, has upon its list of convicts, poor, and insane an army numbering thirty-seven thousand people. I do not exaggerate the fact if I add to this number fifty thousand poor people who are dependent almost wholly on charity, but not included in the classes receiving support by law, and most of them entirely destitute and without the necessary means of supporting life. The men out of employment, and who would be glad to labor if they could find work to do, will number not less than fifty thousand more.

And so stands the case in Pennsylvania. Thirty-seven thousand convicts, paupers, and idiots, and a hundred thousand people besides in poverty, want, and destitution. This army of unfortunates is within the limits of a State with a population of four millions. How is it with the remaining States and Territories, with a population of forty millions more? There are more men undergoing confinement within prison walls this day in America than the rank and file of Washington's army, and there are more men, women, and children praying for their "daily bread" than the soldiers who marched under the banners of the great Napoleon to Moscow.

In a great degree this sad condition of affairs in our country has been the result of our vicious system of class legislation and public and private example. In the place of instructing our youth that labor is honorable, and that it alone can bring health and competency, we have set them the miserable example of engaging in speculation, dealing in stocks, and barter and exchange, which in nine cases out of ten terminates in failure, and then comes disgrace, because they have been led to believe that labor was disgraceful, ignoble, and mean, while the great agricultural field has comparatively remained unoccupied, and men, in the place of making their sons tillers of the soil, or teaching them useful mechanical trades and occupations, have reared them up as gentlemen, and thus destroyed their usefulness as well as their happiness.

Couple this with the class legislation of Congress and the States, the result of which is enriching the rich and making the poor poorer, and you need not ask me why America has more convicts and paupers and idiots than any enlightened country of the same population on the face of the globe.

It has been well said "that money is the root of all evil." And when the plea comes up to this House that we have an indigent and suffering people; that they should have the fostering care of a great and opulent Government; that there is abundant means for relief, there are those narrow-minded, selfish people who breathe the breath of other men: who live upon the crumbs that fall from the table of their master, whose hearts and bodies and souls (if they have any) are his property; who drink when he drinks, swear when he swears, ridicule when he ridicules, cry rabble, despicable rabble, at his nod, who oppose every effort at the exercise of philanthropy urged by conscientious men, and scream demagogue for lack of argument. They are of that class of men who say "die, dog!"—mere servants of English capital in this country, who proclaim "my Congresses," "my Cabinets," "my Presidents," and "my Americas."

When there is a means for relief upon the part of Congress how exceedingly slow to grant it. It is true we voted the other day a small sum, $15,000 I believe, to give poor men employment in filling up the low grounds south of the Capitol. Now we know the extreme want that pervades this city. We know that there are hungry, gaunt men about us. We can see them every day unless we shut our eyes as we pass them and stop our ears to avoid hearing their tales of misery. We know it.

It is in our power to give many of that people employment. I point you to the piles of stone and sand and brick about the unfinished State Department; a thousand men should be placed there. I suppose it is the design of the Government to complete the building. A thousand men could be profitably put to work at the navy-yard; two hundred more in the Patent Office, to rebuild and repair the damage there, and to replace the machinery and models. Pension cases are two years behind for want of sufficient force, and the wounded, limping soldier is notified that he must wait.

And, sir, about the Capitol grounds and public buildings I believe there are ten men on the roll, working nine days in the month, on half pay at that! Hungry men may come up here and look at us! That is a privilege, worth—well, how much? Is the completion of the public buildings to be suspended because it will give employment to labor? Is the navy-yard at this place, with its machinery and manufacturing facilities, to be made a lounging-place for idle men—men who want work and want bread? Shall the soldier's pension be withheld because the Government cannot afford to pay additional clerk hire?

Why is all this? Does the suspension come because all the money must go into the sinking fund to pay in advance the national debt? Men sinking to the earth from poverty and exhaustion had better have some of it.

This state of affairs does not hold out much hope to the poor for material aid. Congress can strike 20 per cent. off from the small pay of the man who sets type in the Government Printing Office and give a hundred thousand dollars to fit out an expedition to Paris to enable gentlemen to dance the can-can in the Latin quarter. Twenty commissioners on big salaries! Reduce the wages of the poor fellow who in storm and sleet and cold daily comes to your door with your mail, and give $18,000 to the General of the Army, who says that "but for the Regular Army the people of this country would degenerate into a mob," and the same sum to the gentleman who bows to imperial majesty at the Court of St. James. [Applause.] Millions to corporations; and where comes in the nod, even, to recognize poverty in rags?

I know that I have no personal motive in urging the principles of this bill upon the House; I have no ambition to gratify; I have no gain to expect. I am but the mouth-piece of a hundred thousand men who send up their appeal to Congress. I admit that my heart throbs for them in their distress. And, sir, I am not afraid to be their advocate; if I were, I should despise myself. So far as my connection with the homestead bill has been the subject of abusive criticism, I have the satisfaction that it has emanated from a small portion of the American press that is and has been for years thoroughly subsidized; that the people who write for these journals write under the lash, as the horse submits to the blows of his rider. It is the whip and the spur that falls upon their shoulders and pierces their flanks. I pity them. They pretend to despise me. And how am I harmed? Their masters think that money is the only true standard of respectability; that labor, manual labor is a badge of dishonor; that toiling men have no right to participate in the affairs of government; that they are mere serfs that should pass as chattels attached to the freehold. They will pardon me for not subscribing to their theories. God gave me a heart to sympathize with human suffering and human woes. Would that He had been as liberal in His gifts to the class I allude to. But probably He knew where He could most safely deposit those gifts which dignify and make manhood noble.

The House will pardon me for the time I have wasted in alluding to the vindictive language of a very, very small portion of the press of this Union. Had I bowed the knee to Baal or fallen down and worshiped the golden calf, I should have escaped their irony. In the place of a "fool," as they called me, I should have been treated with much consideration.

May Heaven protect me from the blighting mildew of their praise! I have lost their respect, but it was only an exchange for the kind hearts of the million, as one to ten thousand. I could afford to make the exchange. As Uncle Toby said to the fly when he opened the window and let him escape—"The world is wide enough for us both." Good-by, gentlemen, I shall have no further occasion to speak of you. I would stagger under a load of suspicion should I receive your praise.

Mr. Speaker, in the passage of this or any other project of legislation I would not give labor the advantage over capital. I would put them upon an equality. A hundred and fifty millions of dollars have been granted in subsidies, either in cash or guarantees, by the Government to capital. The title to two hundred million acres of the best land the sun ever shone upon has been ceded to capital as a free gift. What act of munificence has been bestowed upon labor, excepting the passage of the homestead bill? None that I am aware of.

Mr. Speaker, this bill or some other measure of immediate relief should receive the prompt action of Congress. It is a duty that is incumbent upon us. We owe it to a suffering people. It will be in vain, if the want and distress of the laboring-men of the country continue, to subdue sedition. You must remove the cause. You cannot tamper with so serious a subject. Disturbances will come, and I tell you, sir, that you cannot bridge a volcano with bayonets. Shall it be said that I am an alarmist; that my idea of the present is erroneous; that my view of the future is wild; that my judgment is at fault? Mark my prediction, made this day in my place in this House, that unless you do grant some relief to a suffering people they will exchange seats with some of us in the Forty-sixth Congress. The current of public opinion runs strong against class legislation. Men have not merely become disgusted; they have become excited; they are mad. Can you blame them? The bill may become a failure to-day, but it will be a success to-morrow, because it is the leading policy and first step in advance toward the consummation of that great league which the venerable, learned, and good old philosopher, Elihu Burritt, has declared shall be formed between labor and land. May the bonds be perpetual! May they last forever! [Applause.]

The strength of our laws depends upon an educated and prosperous people. Ignorance and poverty can neither frame laws nor maintain them. What this country is and what we hope it is destined to be depends almost wholly on the social, moral condition of our toiling men. The prosperity of the country lies in their prosperity, and when the day comes which shall mark their decline, the Union, the Republic, the institutions of the country will pass away with them. The poet, in a mood of inspiration, has written the chapter. Let us read it and profit by it:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed can never be supplied.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the majority of the Committee on Pacific Railroads have reported to the House a bill providing for a guarantee by the Government of the interest on the construction bonds of the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company. To the provisions of this bill I desire to call the attention of the House.

I beg to assure the House at the outset of my remarks that in taking part in the discussion of this great question I am not prompted by an ambition to be heard or by a desire to figure in the RECORD and before the country as having made a congressional speech. The time has been when probably the wisest and best-informed constituencies represented here believed that the discussion in this body of grave legislative questions, which in their execution were likely to affect the peace, happiness, and general development of the country, were listened to with marked attention; that the utterance of manly, generous, and patriotic sentiments electrified the House with enthusiasm, while the galleries looked on with eager interest, ready to applaud declarations of principles which were in accord with popular feeling and conviction. Then it was assumed by those represented in this honorable body that it was not only an honor, but a source of great personal gratification to be permitted to exercise the privilege of addressing the Representatives of the American people in Congress assembled. But, sir, these delusions of the public mind have passed away. The people have grown wiser than they were. By the march of general intelligence, by the extended ramifications of the press, by the rapid transit to and from the capital of a great multitude of visitors from all quarters and sections of the country, the people now understand that the age of congressional oratory is over; that declamation here is but a vain and idle display of words; that the general speeches made in this body are not intended to convince or interest those to whom they are directly addressed, but are designed for circulation at home; that the maturest thought, though clothed in all the graceful drapery of language and uttered by lips of great legislative experience, falls upon the listless ears of members whose minds are already made up as to all great questions of either local or national importance and who are necessarily too much preoccupied to listen by the incessant demands of an extensive correspondence, or in drafting bills for the relief of their constituents, or in delving for information into the voluminous records of the Departments, or by the worry of untiring place-hunters, or by the disappointments of committee organizations, or by the profound abstractions of the cloak-room, where, unabashed by the beauty that adorns and unawed by the willing but idle muscle that throngs the galleries, they seek to solve the perplexing financial problems of the age, evolve a new thought on the "silver lunacy," or devise some plan of relief from the unjust, oppressive, and partial excise and customs laws of the land, which are sapping the foundations of agricultural prosperity and weighting down labor with the burden of taxation which should be more equitably adjusted to the ability of capital. Yes, sir, the country now understands that the practical results which follow discussions here amount to but little, and that it is only on certain extraordinary occasions that the ear of the House can be held—as when sarcastic personalities, in which the country has no interest, are indulged in—when the ashes of a dreary, dead past are stirred by the breath of a narrow-minded demagogue—or when "bargain and intrigue" are charged to be hidden beneath the electoral count. On these great (?) occasions we throw aside the pen, drop the newspaper, cease conversation, that we may hear clearly the personal hits, have the fires of sectional hate rekindled in our hearts, and catch fully the latest phase of the great electoral scandal.

A brief experience here has convinced me that in this practical age, he best represents his constituents who wastes but little time in discussion, attends promptly to their correspondence, seeks the information they desire from the Departments, and is ever at his post, ready to place upon record the well-digested convictions of his district as to desired measures of relief, the necessary changes in existing statutes, rendered indispensable by the ever-shifting phases of commerce, navigation, and all our great agricultural and industrial interests. Therefore, sir, I would have been content, for the present at least, to have played the modest rôle of "a quiet looker-on in Vienna," had not circumstances over which I had no control, in the creation of which I had no agency, induced me to pursue a different course, and to become an open and pronounced advocate for the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill.

The constituents I represent, adhering in the main to the grand old traditions of the democratic party, home rule, hard money as a basis for our paper circulation, free trade, equal taxation, and the absolute sovereignty of the people, which, in their enlightened judgment and conviction, constitute the fundamental and essential principles of the highest governmental science, gave me definite instruction as to the course it was their wish I should pursue as to all these great issues in American politics; and so far as they have been involved, either directly or collaterally, in any of the measures which have come before this body for action, I have sought heretofore to represent their views correctly, and will in the future, when any of these issues are presented, endeavor to execute faithfully and justly the trust confided to my hands. But, sir, the questions involved in this bill did not enter in any way into the canvass which resulted in my election to a seat in this honorable body. I should therefore have felt myself free, so far as this measure is concerned, to have pursued a course dictated by my own judgment and controlled only in its conclusions by my own views as to what was best for the general welfare of the country. But, sir, I have been partially relieved from the responsibility of an independent uninstructed action in the premises, by the joint resolution of the Kentucky Legislature, instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives to support this measure; and entirely so by the action of my immediate constituents, who have thought proper, in the exercise of their great constitutional right of petition, to convey to me the expression of their will on this subject, and have instructed me to give to this measure my active and earnest support. It is in obedience to their will that I am on the floor advocating the passage of this bill. I will print as a part of my remarks one of a large number of petitions which have been forwarded to me from the various counties composing the congressional district I have the honor to represent, the signers of which represent largely the various branches of trade and industry as well as the agricultural wealth and professional culture of that section of Kentucky:

Hon. JOHN W. CALDWELL:

We, the undersigned, citizens of your congressional district, respectfully solicit and urge your active support and vote in favor of national aid to a bill to secure the early completion of the Texas Pacific Railroad as a competing southern line of transcontinental railway to the Pacific coast, believing that this line will supply a great want now felt by the commercial interests of the whole country, and be an act of justice to the South in equalizing the bounties of the National Government to such a limited extent only as is in accordance with the exigencies of the public service. A bill that will secure the completion of this great southern project addresses itself at once to our minds as one that will not only stimulate and quicken industrial enterprise and commercial life in the South, but at the same time be in complete unison with an important interest of every citizen of the United States.

We direct your attention to the startling inequality of Government bounties between the North and South, $175,000,000 having been expended to build up and advance commercial and industrial interests in the North, while only eighteen millions of Government expenditures, for the same purpose, have been made in the South and West. And when we reflect that it is plain, under the proposition for national aid to complete the Texas Pacific road on the thirty-second parallel, that no advance of public money is invoked, but simply a Government guarantee of interest, to be indorsed on the bonds of the Texas Pacific Company, under restrictions that thoroughly protect the Government against any outlay for the principal or interest on said company's bonds, with the additional provision subjecting the earnings of the line to the regulating power of Congress, so as to secure to commerce the benefits and economy of the lowest rates consistent with the cost of the road, it is clear to us that no objection on any public ground can be made to this form of Government aid that will cost the Government nothing.

We think the South and Southwest could fairly lay claim to a more substantial form of national assistance in Government bonds to complete the Texas Pacific across our Territories to the Pacific coast, but when the Texas Pacific Company show that, if the Government will indorse on its bonds a guarantee only of the interest, and retain a sufficient number of the bonds to protect itself against any outlay for its interest guarantee, if such a security will give the company access to capital, the disposition of investors to purchase such a bond at once establishes the fact that the Government is not asked to grant a subsidy, because if such a security can be marketed there can be no question that the Government will ever be required to advance, much less lose, a single dollar.

When we consider the fact that over ninety millions in Government bonds have been given as a subsidy to build the existing line to the Pacific coast, which is not only a monopoly, giving human selfishness the power to wield a despotic rule over the commercial interests of the whole country, and a subsidy of $15,000 per day to meet the interest on said bonds is continuously being paid by the Government for the construction of this line, which is located too far porth to meet the wants of the South, any opposition to the proposed form of Government aid to the Texas Pacific line, the completion of which would vitalize the railway property, the industrial and commercial interests of the South, appears inimical to the prosperity of our section.

Believing as I do that the will of the people is the broad base upon which rests our fabric of government, and that it is the duty of the representatives of this sovereign power to execute under all circumstances its will unless restrained by provisions of the organic law, if I could not, sir, have honestly harmonized my own views on this important question of public policy with those of the Legislature of my State and the decided opinions and convictions of my immediate constituents, I know of but one course that would have been left open to me by honor and good faith to the people I represent: to have tendered back to them a trust which I could not execute in conformity to their wishes. Taking a broad view of the subject and having as I hope an intelligent comprehension of the wants of the country, I cheerfully comply with the request of the Kentucky Legislature and the demands of my constituents, and shall vote for and advocate the pending bill; and to the reasons which induce this conclusion on my part I now address myself.

Without attempting a thorough analysis of this bill, suffice it to say, sir, that it projects a great transcontinental railroad through Arkansas, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and Southern California, from some point on the Mississippi River, to be selected by commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, not farther north than the city of Memphis, to San Diego, on the Pacific coast; that said railroad, from its eastern terminus to Marshall, in the State of Texas, shall be acquired by purchase or construction by said Texas and Pacific Company, and be paid for by issuing its mortgage bonds not to exceed, for each mile of said road, the sum of $20,000; that for the construction and equipment of that part of said railway reaching from Fort Worth to San Diego, estimated to be fourteen hundred miles, said company shall issue its bonds known as "class A" at the rate of $20,000 per mile, except for the space of two hundred and fifty miles, and then at the rate of $35,000 per mile, due and payable in fifty years, and to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, in coin, payable half-yearly, and which bonds shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $31,750,000; that the said company shall issue bonds known and designated as "class B," at the rate of $5,000 per mile, on that part of said line from Fort Worth to San Diego, and aggregating $7,000,000, due and payable at the same time as "class A," and bearing the same rate of interest; that the Secretary of the Treasury shall indorse on behalf of the Government a guarantee of the interest on all of said bonds which shall not exceed for the two classes the sum of $38,750,000; that the bonds known as "class A" shall be delivered to said company at the rate of $20,000 per mile on the completion of every ten consecutive miles of said railroad and when the same has been examined and received by the Commissioners appointed by the President of the United States; that Congress shall have the right to regulate the through freight and passenger tariff on the entire line of said railway between its termini; that the said company shall never consolidate with any other corporation or discriminate in its freight and passenger tariff against any lines of railway connecting with it, under the penalty of a forfeiture of its rights, franchises, and privileges under this act; that to indemnify the Government against any loss for interest guaranteed, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to hold the bonds known as "class B" until the entire road is completed, and sell the same, or as many as may be necessary, to meet any interest for which the company may be in default; that the Government, for the purpose of meeting said interest, shall retain any money due said company for mail or telegraphic service, for the transportation of troops and supplies, or any other Government transportation, on that part of said line upon which the Government has guaranteed the interest on the bonds of said company; that said company shall surrender to the Government the grant of lands heretofore made to it in New Mexico, Arizona, and Southern California, which are to be sold by the Government at the usual price for Government lands in railroad reservations, and the purchase money for the same shall be applied to the payment of the interest on said bonds and to the creation of a sinking fund to liquidate the principal of the debt; that the said company, as an additional sinking fund, shall annually pay into the Treasury of the United States 1 per cent. of the entire issue of bonds, and that said company shall build said line entire in six years from its acceptance of the provisions of this act, and shall, to secure its compliance with its obligations under this bill, execute to the Government a first mortgage on all its property, franchises, and earnings.

The first great question which this bill presents for consideration and solution is one of organic construction, involving the power of Congress to authorize the indorsement of these bonds by way of a guarantee of interest on the same, as contemplated by the provisions of the act.

Those to whom I am known, sir, do not need to be informed as to the political views which I entertain or as to the principles which would control my action; but, comparatively a stranger here I trust that I will be excused for saying that "After the most straitest sect of the faith" I have lived a democrat, ever cherishing the idea of a strict construction of the Federal Constitution, as "the palladium of our liberties," the great bulwark of the States and people against the insidious encroachments of Federal power, the broad shield to maintain home rule against the mailed hand of an irresponsible military domination. This inscription of strict construction on the old party flag, was the political idol of my youth and the object of my worship in maturer years. The political wisdom it embodies was to me as the divine light of the Shekinah to the faithful son of Judah. I have no hesitation in stating that if this question was presented now for the first time for legislative action or judicial sanction, I would feel myself compelled by reason of that interpretation which I have always given to the Constitution to deny the power of Congress to authorize this indorsement. But, sir, an adverse constitutional theory, though sanctified by the wisest statesmanship, though sustained by a series of logical deductions which would seem irrefutable, though associated with and festooned by memories that are sacred to the heart, has given way before the demands of a progressive civilization, has yielded to the necessity for development, and has fallen before the established construction which springs from a long line of precedents.

When by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which confers on Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, Hell Gate has been tunneled by the strong arm of the Government, and its stony masses sunk to lower depths, its raging waters calmed, that the commerce of the world, the shipping of nations might ride in safety to the wharves of our great commercial center; when by the power conferred by the same constitutional grant Congress has expended millions of dollars in coast surveys and for the improvement of the numerous harbors which indent our lake, gulf, and ocean boundaries; when under the authority to regulate commerce between the States, rivers have been improved, canals dug and extended by the expenditure of vast sums of money from the common treasury and the donation of magnificent land grants from the general domain of the States and the people; when by virtue of these powers, coupled with those which authorize Congress to establish post-roads, declare war, repel invasion, provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States a great transcontinental railway has been built by Government aid in bonds and grand donations of public land; when the democratic party by its platform twenty years ago indorsed the building of a Pacific Railroad by Government aid, and its presidential candidate in 1856, "whose walk," to quote from the Junius of America, "was on the mountain tops of the law," referring to the question of the constitutionality of the project, declared in an open letter to the country that the constitutional power was found in the right of Congress "to declare war and repel invasion;" when all these vast sums of money have been expended, these grand donations of the public domain given to aid in the construction of similar and kindred enterprises by congressional enactments, which have received the sanction and indorsement of many of the most distinguished statesmen of the country, among whom are Benton, Douglas, and Buchanan, as well as the Great Commoner of Kentucky, and him who, nameless here, sleeps by his side in the shadows of historic Ashland, whose fame, when prejudice shall die, will shine out in all the splendor of eternal youth; when we are confronted, sir, with all these congressional enactments and estimate correctly the powerful indorsement of these distinguished statesmen and find by examination that these acts of Congress and opinions of leading constitutional lawyers have been fully sustained by the judicial department of the Government, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is too late to interpose a strict construction of the organic law as an insurmountable barrier to the passage of this bill. Is not this great enterprise, which this bill proposes to aid and build up, closely allied in the interest it affects and in the objects of its construction to many of those which I have mentioned in general terms? Will it not be, if completed, a great postal route for the transmission of the foreign and domestic mails of the country? Will it not be a grand military road by which to make war, repel invasion, and provide for the common defense; by which armies can be massed, troops hurried to the Pacific coast or our southwestern borders; by which supplies and munitions of war can be furnished to the Pacific navy and to the troops who are watching over the wild tribes of New Mexico, Arizona, and Southern California? Will it not be a great channel for the interchange of the products of the States and regulate and increase our internal commerce more than the improvement of any river or the building of any canal has ever done? Will it not form a grand highway to the ocean for all our agricultural and industrial productions that seek a market in China, Japan, Australia, Mexico, the west coast of South America, and the islands of the Pacific? Will it not, sir, by reason of its connecting lines east of the Mississippi River become a great thoroughfare for international travel and commercial exchange? Yes, sir, it not only combines great postal, military, and commercial advantages, which are of vast importance to the Government and to the States, Territories, and people of the Union, but it is a measure that will promote the general welfare of the entire country by the establishment of a permanent peace between the sections, based upon an identity of interest and a restoration of perfect confidence, and will furnish to the entire country North and South a great through line for freight and travel, competing with that grand monopoly of the West, which, if unchecked in its avarice and grasp after power, will eventually wind the iron arms of its great financial strength and influence around the entire West, and with the arrogance of resistless power command Legislatures and people alike to obey its voice and do its bidding.

Mr. Speaker, while I do not believe in the communistic idea of a paternal government which interferes directly in the management of the household, and on every light and trivial occasion extends the hand of charity to its citizens, I assert that when it is admissible by its organic law it is not a departure from the true science of government in periods of great financial distress for Government to inaugurate great enterprises for the development of its territory, which will not only prove to be monuments of its munificence but secure an increase of commercial greatness and hasten the return of prosperity to its suffering citizens. If we could look back to the aged civilizations of the world; if we could reanimate the dust of its slumbering kings, monarchs, and rulers; fill out the historic pages left imperfect by the flight of time, we would doubtless learn, that many of the great works of antiquity which have been the wonder of succeeding ages were projected by government, not only to perpetuate national glory and extend its commerce, make war, and provide for the common defense; but were directly designed to afford employment to idle labor that the people might be sheltered, clothed, and fed. This idea of government is as old as commercial want or the necessities of civilized man, and has entered largely into the administrative policy of all the great nations of ancient and modern times.

Then why should we hesitate in the adoption of this measure for the relief and development of the country? Is it not constitutional? Is it not demanded alike by the necessities of the Government, the wants of commerce, and the financial distress of the country? The power of any language I can command, sir, fails to estimate fully the beneficial results to all our great industrial interests which would follow the passage of this bill and the construction of this great railway line.

To illustrate it meagerly, take a hurried survey of the condition of the country. What do we find? Why, sir, while we are rich in all the natural sources of commercial prosperity; while we have a great area of cotton territory which, if thoroughly developed and planted, would furnish that great staple in sufficient quantity to employ the spindles of the world; while we have a sugar-belt, the extent and fertility of which if rescued from overflow and subjected to proper tillage, would yield that necessary article for every household in an amount largely beyond that taken for home consumption; while our lands, North and South, are adapted to the growth of the cereals, and our country must ultimately become the great bread market for all the nations of the earth; while we have vast forests of the finest of timbers as yet untouched by the saw or the axe; while we have great mountains of iron, copper, and all the baser metals; while we have inexhaustible coal-fields underlying nearly every State and Territory of the Union; while the precious metals, gold and silver, are found in paying quantities all over the West; while we have broad rivers upon which our commerce finds its way to the sea; while we have skilled artisans and improved machinery of every description; while we have a population comprising over forty millions of people, strong of arm and stout of heart, filled with the energy, enthusiasm, and pluck, which comes from the genius of our free institutions; while we have all these sources of prosperity, protected by the best form of government known to the history of man, what, I ask, sir, is the condition of the country to-day? Are we not passing through an era of great financial distress? Are not nearly all our industries languishing? Is not property of every description, including our annual agricultural productions, greatly depressed? Do not care, anxiety, and uncertainty look out from the faces of all our business men? Are not the hammer of the auctioneer and the voice of the bankrupt assignee heard in all our States? Are not failures and bankruptcies largely on the increase? Have not banks, commercial houses, and manufacturing companies, which were seemingly as firmly rooted in the financial confidence of the country as the oak to its native soil, that drives its fastenings into the heart of the earth, gone down in the financial storm which is sweeping over the country, and which day by day is extending the circle of its wide-spread desolation? Is not the strong-armed, hard-handed labor of the country largely idle, tramping over the land like the scattered fragments of a demoralized army, being fed, clothed, and sheltered by the hand of charity? We may differ as to the causes which produced this dangerous, frightful state of public affairs; charge it upon the one hand to a contraction of the currency and the demonetization of silver, coupled with a bad and vicious governmental policy, which has afflicted the country for the past decade; or, on the other, attribute it to overproduction, reckless extravagance, the inflation of the currency, and the expansion of values, which sprung from and followed the war; but as to the facts we will hardly dispute, for the evidence of their truth is seen in every newspaper, is heard in the distressed cry of the people for relief, that comes up from every quarter of the country, as sad in its tone as the rush of the winds through a forest of pine and as terribly significant, if unheeded, as the flash which precedes the bolt that crushes forever by its electric power.

The passage of this bill, Mr. Speaker, will put a new face on all our commercial affairs. Fifty millions of idle unemployed capital will be drawn from Europe and our own accumulations let loose in all the channels of trade and circulate throughout all our borders. Eighteen hundred miles of railway will be built, and this will demand the engineering skill of the country. The road-bed must be made, the fills raised, the cuts dug, the mountains tunneled, the cross-ties and rails placed; here, sir, is remunerative work for the ordinary laborers of the land, which will give them food, clothing, and shelter. Streams are to be crossed, piers raised, bridges and depots built; here, sir, is work for the skilled mechanics, which will give them wages to provide for their wives and little ones. Vast quantities of rough and manufactured lumber will be used in the construction of bridges, depots, for general equipment, and for the improvement of the country; here, sir, is an increased market for all the branches of our great lumber trade. Engines, cars, and general machinery will be needed in large quantities; here, sir, is labor for the skilled machinists and profits for the manufacturer. Thirty-six hundred miles of steel or iron rails of American manufacture are to be laid; here, sir, is prosperity to the great iron interests of the country. A large force of engineers, conductors, firemen, and general operatives must be employed; here, sir, is an outlet for our surplus railroad operatives who are charged with having fomented the late strike which cost the country so much anxiety and so many millions of dollars. Supplies of every kind and character will be needed; here, sir, is a return of prosperity to all branches of our trade and traffic. The amount of money necessary to construct this great railway from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean gradually let loose in the channels of trade will revive all our industries and circulate throughout all the veins of our internal commerce. It will act like healing medicine on the waste of disease, bring health to our finances, and a return of prosperity to our trade.

No government can long retain the respect and confidence of its people that dispenses its benefactions by an unjust rule of discrimination; that deals out its bounties with a partial hand; grants to one locality what it refuses to another that is equally dependent on its aid for development, and has an equal claim to its protection and an equal right to demand its fostering care by reason of paying by its taxation its full share to its treasury, and contributing by its production its full quota to its commercial standing and power. If, sir, a government would be secure in the allegiance of its citizens, build up and perpetuate a healthy public sentiment, preserve a genuine love for its institutions, develop a patriotic pride in its power, cultivate a zeal for its integrity and a spirit of devotion to its flag, it must, sir, in dispensing its blessings, pursue a rule of equal justice and liberality to all parts of its empire. Here let me ask has this just and equitable rule of government been pursued by Congress in its grand donations of the public domain and its vast expenditures from the public Treasury in aid of railroads, canals, and for the general improvement of the States and Territories of the Union? No one will assert it, sir, for no one can sustain such a declaration. On the contrary, the most reliable statistical information clearly demonstrates that the benignant spirit of government has been exercised largely in one direction; that its magnificent benefactions in land grants and money for the improvement and development of the country have been bestowed in great excess on one section of the Union over the other. I am not complaining of what has been done for one section of our common country, but simply insisting that the benign spirit of Government, its fostering hand, its powerful and necessary aid shall now be extended with equal liberality to the neglected one, that both may share alike in its magnificent blessings, and have equal cause to respect its power, promote its glory, love its institutions, and defend its flag.

I submit, sir, as a part of my remarks, a table taken from Mr. Spofford's statistical almanac for the year 1878, which collates the several acts of Congress granting lands to the States and various corporations for railway purposes, from the first act in 1850 to the present time:

A critical examination of this table when supplemented by a grant of 18,000,000 acres to the Texas and Pacific Company, which seems to have been omitted by the author, discloses the fact that Congress has granted in aid of railroads, out of the public domain, a grand aggregate of 209,663,994 acres, which, if embraced in one body, would form a territorial area larger than the powerful State of Texas, nearly five times the extent of the great Empire State of the Union, and sufficient of itself, in its extent of boundary and through its agricultural and mineral resources, to support a great nation. A classification, sir, of these magnificent land grants by the usually accepted sectional lines authorizes the statement that the South has received 44,963,419 acres, while the grants to the North amount to 164,700,575 acres, or 119,737,156 acres in excess of the amount donated to the South for similar purposes. When you add to this glaring inequality in the distribution of the public lands for the purposes of improvement and general development, that the North has drawn from the general Treasury for public works and buildings, up to 1874, $76,859,609, as against $11,612,086 expended in the South for similar purposes, and that for the construction of canals, wagon-roads, &c., the same section has received $19,155,859 as against $6,981,982 drawn from the general Treasury for like improvements in the South; and, sir, when you still add to these figures the vast sum of nearly $90,000,000 in bonds issued and interest paid by the Government for the construction of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads and their various branches, and supplement this grand array of land grants and direct appropriations in money, bonds, and interest with the annual appropriation of nearly $27,000,000 for the support of the wounded and disabled defenders of the Government during the late war, who followed the flag in Sherman's march to the sea and crowned it with victory by the surrender of Lee's wasted and shattered columns at Appomattox, nearly nine-tenths of which is distributed in the same section of the country, you have a clear view of the distribution of the numerous benefactions of Government for the improvement and development of the country and for the support and maintenance of its people, and a distinct view, sir, of the marked discrimination made by Congress in favor of one section over the other. The great inequality in the division of the practical benefits of Government and the manifest partiality displayed in distributing its bounties, which these statistical facts display and establish beyond the hope of successful denial, make an argument in support of the justice and necessity of this measure which cannot be resisted by an impartial and unbiased mind. Will not these facts appeal to the boasted justice, liberality, and magnanimity of the northern people, and induce their Representatives in this honorable body to give to this bill, which looks to the development of the long-neglected section and the promotion of the general welfare of all the States and people of the Republic, their warm and cordial support, especially when they remember in this connection that the grand old State of Virginia, which has done so much by the genius and statesmanship of her sons to lay the enduring foundation of free government, to promote the glory of the Republic, and to illustrate by heroic deeds our common history, gave in the day of her pride and power to the General Government, without price, the territory out of which were formed the great and prosperous States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, and when they are reminded of the fact that all our vast possessions west of the Mississippi River were acquired by purchase-money drawn from the general Treasury of the States and the people, and that "the southern heart," which they think is so easily fired, not only freely bled in their defense at the Thames, Tippecanoe, and the river Raisin, but contributed largely of its blood to uphold the honor and glory of the Government in the grand march of the American Army from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico? Whatever, sir, in the estimation of the northern people may be the faults of the South, arising from constitutional theories taught her people by her greatest and purest statesmen, no one familiar with American history will ever deny that she has been generous and heroic in her devotion to the honor and glory of the Republic as against its foreign foes.

Mr. Speaker, if these marked discriminations in the distribution of Government benefactions are to continue, if the material aid contemplated by this measure and which is so necessary for the development of the South is withheld, if the North manifests an unwillingness through her Representatives to equalize to some extent the great bounties of Government, then, when all these appropriations made by Congress for the improvement of northern States and Territories are reviewed by the people, and the manifest partiality of the Government is brought to light, the country will understand, sir, that the Southern States are held simply as sources of revenue, provinces from which to gather tribute for the support of the Government, and that the vaunted justice and impartiality of the Government is a solemn fraud, a thinly disguised mockery, and the impartial judgment of this age on this subject will be confirmed by the unbiased verdict of posterity. We have heard much in the past decade of the superior sagacity, industry, and thrift of our northern brethren, and while I cheerfully bear testimony to their culture, frugality, and progressive spirit, and would not detract one iota from the glory of their grand achievements, the secret of their wonderful progress lies hidden in part in congressional enactments which have promoted and substantially aided all their great enterprises and have continually extended to them the liberal, fostering hand of Government. Give to the South 119,737,156 acres of land for railroad purposes which have been donated to the North in excess of the grants to her for like enterprises; give to the South $65,247,512 to equalize her in public works and buildings; give to the South $12,173,877 to adjust the difference in wagon-roads and canals; give to the South the grand sum of $90,000,000 of the public money to complete a great transcontinental railway through her borders, connecting with her railroad system east of the Mississippi River, with branches traversing Arkansas, Louisiana, Missouri, the magnificent domain of Texas, and the pastoral and mineral lands of New Mexico, Arizona, and Southern California; provide her with a grand highway by which her commerce may find cheap and rapid transportation to either ocean; make through her borders a great thoroughfare for international traffic and travel, and you will fill the minds and hearts of her people with the spirit of progress and development. Her hills and valleys would teem with population; her rich cotton lands be as white as the great snow-sheds of Russia and Siberia with the wealth of her great staple; her cereal territory be rich with the golden grain of the harvest; her vast forests of valuable timbers be opened to all the branches of the lumber trade; her tobacco lands would be pressed by superior tillage to yield to their utmost capacity; her great water-power would be utilized by machinery for manufacturing purposes; her grand plateaus would be filled with bleating flocks and lowing herds; her towns and cities now moldering in the dust and ashes of the desolation of war would spring up from their ruins as if under the influence of magic, and grow rapidly in commercial standing and importance. Yes, sir, if the sections of our common country were equalized in Government benefactions we would hear no more of the superiority of one part of the same race over the other. The civilizations of Plymouth Rock and Jamestown are branches from the same great parent stem, and their vines and tendrils are now and forever inseparably intertwined; and if one exhibits more vigor, vitality, and richer foliage than the other, it simply results from the fact that the paternal hand of Government has sheltered, nourished, and protected it to a larger extent.

But, Mr. Speaker, the South is not here asking to be equalized in Government bounties. She is not demanding any further grants of the public domain. She is not claiming equality in public works and buildings. She is not seeking an adjustment of the difference against her in wagon-roads, canals, &c. She is not asking for a loan of $90,000,000 for railroad enterprises; but she is with modesty and dignity simply demanding, in view of her ruin and desolation, and in view of all that has been done for the other section of the country, that the Government loan its credit to one of her great enterprises, upon the success of which so greatly depends her rehabilitation and general development, and tenders as security for the indorsement she asks, franchises, property, and earnings sufficient to indemnify the Government against any possible loss. This brings me, sir, to the consideration of the financial responsibility of the Government under the provisions of this act. It guarantees a yearly interest of $1,937,500 for fifty years. This is the entire liability of the Government. And what security does it receive to indemnify it against the possibility of loss? First, the act retains in the Treasury until the entire line is completed, $7,000,000 of the guaranteed bonds of the company, known as "class B," unless disposed of by virtue of the provision which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell them whenever it is necessary to meet the interest of which the company may be in default. Secondly, it relinquishes to the Government control of all the lands granted to said company to aid in the construction of its line through New Mexico, Arizona, and Southern California, estimated at eighteen millions of acres, and authorizes the Government to sell the same, at the usual price for Government lands in railroad reservations, and hold the proceeds of sale to pay interest, if necessary, and to create a sinking fund to meet the principal of said bonds. Thirdly, it authorizes the Government to retain all sums due said company for the transportation of troops and supplies, and for postal and telegraphic service on that part of said line upon which it has guaranteed the interest on the bonds of said company.

The security offered seems to be more than ample to meet any liability assumed by the Government, in any contingency that can possibly arise. If the road is pressed to an early completion, as I have no doubt it will be, the bonds retained in the Treasury will be fully sufficient to meet the interest guaranteed until the company has a completed line from the Mississippi River to San Diego, without touching one dollar of the earnings of the road during the period of its construction. When the construction of this road begins, the country along its entire line will be thrown open, towns and villages will necessarily spring up, the salubrity of the climate, the fertility of the soil, and the rich mineral resources of the country will attract a large population, the lands granted by the General Government will be in demand for settlement, and their gradual sale will yield a large part of the necessary amount to meet the interest on the bonds of the company. I have but little doubt that in ten or twenty years from the completion of this road, before you and I, sir, in the regular course of nature have gone the way of all the earth, the value of these lands will of itself be fully sufficient to liquidate the entire interest of the bonds. When you add to this landed security the right of the Government to hold any money due the company for mail and telegraphic service, and for the transportation of troops, supplies, &c., it seems almost impossible that the company should ever be in default of its interest from these sources alone. So far nothing has been said as to the probable earnings of this great railway and its ability in this way to meet the interest on its bonds and provide a sinking fund for the principal of the debt. Its local traffic will increase with every mile that is constructed, and when its connections are perfected between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean its carrying trade and passenger travel will be incalculable. Over it will come and go a large part of our trade with Mexico, South America, and the Asiatic nations, and much of the trade and travel between these nations and the powers of the Old World.

Its extensive connections east and west of the Mississippi River will bring to this great trunk line by way of Saint Louis, Memphis, Vicksburgh, and New Orleans, all our productions and manufactures going out to foreign nations, while theirs coming in will be distributed by the same channel throughout all the States and Territories of the Union. The mildness of the climate and the agricultural and mineral resources of the States and Territories through which it runs, coupled with the fact that it is the shortest line that can be built, must make it a superior road to the Union Pacific for the purposes of travel and the carriage of through freight. And this, sir, is the reason why this grand monopoly which was in reality built by the Government and donated to its stockholders has so strenuously and viciously fought, not only here, but everywhere, the construction of this great competing railway line. As a basis of conjecture, merely, as to the probable earnings of the Texas and Pacific railroad, I submit as a part of my remarks Mr. Spofford's table as to the earnings of twenty-two hundred and fifty-one miles of Pacific Railroads for a series of four years, beginning in 1873 and closing with 1876:

A table showing gross and net earnings of Pacific Railroads for four years.

Pacific Railroads.	1873.	1874.	1875.	1876.
Miles of railroad	2,251	2,251	2,251	2,251
Earnings from passengers	$8,641,013	$9,002,276	$10,243,956	$10,216,424
Earnings from freight, &c	15,568,931	15,792,318	18,770,892	20,817,379
Earnings from all sources	24,209,944	24,794,584	29,014,848	31,033,803
Net earnings	13,648,195	14,374,742	16,614,855	17,033,517
Dividends	1,698,265	3,256,530	7,632,250	7,299,000

From this table it will be seen that the net earnings of these roads have steadily increased, and that in the year 1876 their net earnings amounted to the enormous sum of $17,033,517—over one-half of the sum necessary to build and equip the Texas and Pacific Railway from Fort Worth to San Diego. Is it not reasonable to suppose, sir, that the Texas and Pacific, located in a milder climate, running through States and Territories richer in agricultural and mineral resources, opening up a trade with Northern Mexico, doing a reasonable share of foreign transportation and travel, requiring a smaller sum for operating expenses than the roads whose lines have been blocked with the snows of an inhospitable climate, would earn an amount comparable to the sum indicated in this table, namely, $7,568 per mile, or aggregating on fourteen hundred miles of railway, from Fort Worth to San Diego, the sum of $10,596,600, over five times the yearly interest guaranteed by the Government on the bonds of this company?

But admit, for the sake of the argument, that the construction of the Texas and Pacific would reduce, by virtue of its competition, the estimated earnings of all our Pacific roads, who would be injured by it, sir? Would not the people be benefited? Would not freights and travel be cheapened and the entire country be freed from the fearful exactions of the Pacific railroad ring, which now has a perfect monopoly of all the travel and carrying trade between the Atlantic and Pacific States? Disguise it as we may, sir, the people at last bear all the burdens of Government, pay all the vast earnings of railway corporations, and it is time that the legislation of the country should look to their interest and protection and give to them, so far as it has the power, cheaper freights and cheaper travel. These desirable results will inevitably follow the passage of this bill; for Congress retains the power to regulate the freight and passenger tariff on the Texas and Pacific, if it is constructed, for all time to come; and, if it legislates wisely and for the people, it will exercise this power in the interest of the people.

No one can doubt, from the great rivalry that must necessarily exist between these great competing lines, that the power to regulate the freight and passenger charges upon the one is tantamount to the regulation of both so far as through freights and travel are concerned. But, granting that the net earnings of the Texas and Pacific Railroad will fall far below $7,568 per mile, or $10,596,600 for the entire line, still the Government would never risk a dollar, for, if its net earnings were only $2,325 per mile, a little over one-fifth of the earnings estimated, it still could pay the annual interest of $1,937,500 on its bonds and provide the 1 per cent. on the whole issue of its bonds, or $387,500, the necessary yearly sinking fund required by this act, for the payment of the principal of the debt.

So far in this discussion, sir, I have endeavored to establish the constitutionality of this bill and show that it is in strict conformity with the organic construction which has resulted from a long line of precedents; that it projects a great military and postal road necessary for Government uses; that it is a great measure of relief for the country, which is bowed down by the gloom of financial depression; that justice demands its passage in order that the benefactions of Government may to some degree be equalized; that the expansion of our internal and foreign commerce and the development of our Territories and the unhappy section which was wasted by war demands the construction of this great transcontinental railway; and finally, that the Government does not increase its indebtedness or risk a dollar by the indorsement asked for by the company.

Now, sir, I wish to present this great enterprise as a governmental necessity, when viewed by the light of past and contemporaneous history. He has studied humanity to but little purpose and the history of nations with but little profit that has not been led irresistibly to the conclusion that it is impossible for two distinct and antagonistic systems of civilization, divided by no great natural barrier, to dwell for an indefinite time side by side in perfect unity. The stronger will either incorporate the weaker and the latter will thus lose its identity or by its resistance it will be utterly extinguished. Such has been the fate of many nations which have gone before us. The map of the world is continually changing. A few centuries ago and the Russian was locked up on the frozen shores of the Baltic, but step by step he has gone toward the Mediterranean and the Pacific Ocean, incorporating, as he advanced, the Cossack, the Pole, the Slavonian, and many of the nomadic tribes of the East as a part of his grand empire. A few centuries ago and the Englishman was confined to the half of a small island, but his aggressive, determined, and enterprising spirit has incorporated the Welshman, the Scotchman, the Irishman, the Indian, the Canadian, and the African under his form of government. Now his influence is felt all over the world, his flag is on every sea, and the roll of his drum is heard on every continent. Comparatively a few years ago and the Spaniard was in Florida, the Frenchman in Louisiana, the Mexican in Texas, California, and a large part of our southwestern territory, and the Russian was in Alaska. Now the flag of the Republic floats over all of these. Surely these historical facts are not without their significance. They establish the rule I announced and declare in unmistakable language that the progressive spirit of American civilization will extend its power from the lakes to the isthmus. "The wish" in this matter is by no means, sir, "the father of the thought." I am guided to this conclusion by the logic of facts and by the light and experience of history. Then why not prepare for it? Why not be ready to meet the destiny we cannot shun?

A wise statesmanship is not restricted in its plans of governmental policy by a day, a month, or a year; but looks far beyond, and horoscopes the future by experience and passing events. Here let me ask, Mr. Speaker, will the great Northwest, which has been fostered, cherished, and built up by immense donations of public money and grants of public land, deny the bounty of the Government to another section forever united to it by an identity of interests, inseparably joined for weal or for woe by the great Father of Waters, which, with its tributaries, drains so much of the territory of both sections, and floats alike their commerce to the sea? I cannot believe, sir, that her course will be so selfish and unjust. Will the East, which has had millions of dollars of the public money expended on her coast line for the improvement of her harbors, and for other public works and buildings, and which has grown rich through the immense annual tribute she has drawn from the section which furnished largely the raw materials for the fabrics she has manufactured, refuse her support to this great measure? A sound financial judgment, a keen foresight of the future, would it seems to me suggest to her able statesmen a different policy. The passage of this bill will strengthen the public credit and give additional security for the payment of the national debt. But lately the East was threatened from the other wing of the Capitol by a learned and distinguished republican Senator with a combination between the West and the South. Responding in this connection to that declaration, as the Representative in part of a Southern State, and fully identified personally with the South in all her sad and mournful history, I will say for her that she seeks no combination with any quarter of the country against the other, but, planting herself upon the Constitution as amended, looks not to the past but to the future, and while earnestly desiring the prosperity of the entire Union from the lakes to the Gulf, from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific slope, respectfully demands from the East and West alike a liberal and just consideration of her claim to share in the benefactions of the Government.

Will the South, sir, ruined by the desolation of war, with the accumulations of a century swept away, with her towns and cities in ashes, with her rich fields laid waste, with her people greatly impoverished, with her railway system languishing, with so many natural sources of prosperity within her borders and so much in want of the development which will follow the extension of Government aid to this great enterprise, the completion of which will enable her to keep pace with the progress of the North and take her rightful place in this great confederation of States, listen to the voice of prejudice and give to this measure, that looks to her prosperity, development, and rehabilitation, a divided support simply because it is under the management of a northern man; or, with too great a spirit of reverence for the past, madly cling to a strict construction of the Constitution as an insurmountable barrier to the passage of this bill—an idea, sir, long obsolete as a matter of fact in congressional action so far as measures of this nature and kindred ones are concerned? Unwise, in my opinion, would be such a course on the part of her Representatives, and unappreciated, I think, such action by the great body of her people. Will any one here refuse his support to this bill on account of the malevolent passions and prejudices engendered by the late war? If so, I would say to him, coming as I do from a district largely represented in both the Federal and Confederate armies, and numbering among my warmest personal and political friends both the wearers of the blue and the gray, that the brave and true men who stood by their respective sections in that terrible conflict, recognizing the fact that the dust of their heroic dead mingles upon the same battle-fields and that the military genius and prowess of both sections will live in history and blended form for posterity a heritage of warlike glory, have planted the rose of peace, the flowers of reconciliation, on the grave of our common national sorrow; and cursed forever be the narrow-minded, bigoted, and malignant spirit that attempts by the poisonous, pestilential breath of demagogery to scatter their leaves!

It is time, sir, that those who would legislate for the American people should respond both in sentiment and action to the spirit of the age, aspire to the true dignity of American statesmanship, rise to the higher planes of patriotism, and taking a broad view of the wants of the country, look to its development without regard to sections or localities. In conclusion, sir, when this great enterprise shall be completed; when another grand transcontinental railway shall span the continent from the Mississippi River to the Pacific coast; when another mighty thoroughfare of internal traffic and international exchange shall be opened up; when another iron band of union shall be laid, binding together our widely-extended empire, and all the blessings of development, expanded commerce, cheapened freights and travel which will follow in its train shall be experienced and enjoyed by all the States and people of the Republic, then we will realize the glory, grandeur, and commercial power of our country on a scale of magnificence far exceeding the view of the great New England statesman who in yonder Senate Chamber, looking out in his mind's eye upon the future of his country, quoted as illustrating its glory and magnificent water boundary the poet's beautiful description of the heaven-wrought shield of the heroic Greek—

> Now the broad shield complete the artist crown'd
> With its last band and poured the ocean round;
> In living silver seemed the waves to roll,

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not commend itself to my judgment, either in principle or detail. As a measure at this time it is uncalled for by the people, and I believe is unwarranted in the present condition of the business of the country. Every industry is depressed almost to the verge of bankruptcy, and this measure must have the effect to increase the uncertainty and tend to the embarrassment of every branch of legitimate business.

The revenue from customs is a necessity. It would be madness to attempt to dispense with it or to any considerable extent lessen the annual receipts from this source. The industries of the country, its trade and commerce, have, and of necessity must accomodate themselves to the system of customs duties. These are institutions of slow growth, and profitable changes must be the work of judgment and time; forced and violent changes are revolution and ruin.

I had hoped that if the tariff was to be interfered with at this session of Congress, it would have only been proposed to make such changes as experience had shown would be wise as an aid to our crippled industries, or might tend to simplify the process and render certain the honest collection of the revenue.

That abuses and frauds have sprung up in the execution of the present customs laws whereby revenue is lost and honest trade is injured, probably no one doubts; and where it is possible to break up these abuses by simplifying the mode of levying the duties or rendering their collection more certain, the duty of Congress is plain. Sugar in some form is the great item of our duty-paying imports. It is an article of necessity and of universal use, and in which vast capitals are embarked in its preparation and distribution. Justice and security to all these interests, as well as common honesty to the Government, require that the vast revenue raised from this article should be levied and collected evenly and without partiality. That this rule has not been uniformly observed is common knowledge and common complaint. Whether the fault is in the complicated provisions of the present law or results from the perverse ingenuity of man are questions which it is hardly worth while to stop to discuss. The evils of the present law are bad enough, and the tax-payer has a right to expect, or even demand, if changes are made, that they shall be in the direction of simplifying the law and rendering frauds upon the revenue more difficult, if not entirely broken up. So far as I can judge, the proposed law instead of remedying any of the defects in the present law, or breaking up the abuses practiced in its execution, in relation to this great item of our revenue-paying imports is one most adroitly devised to protect and encourage every abuse and fraud upon the revenue and trade now existing.

Instead of simplifying the mode of levying duties the proposed act but adds new and subtle processes of mystification. The whole system of levying or rating of duties is made to hinge upon the results to be arrived at by scientific experts. A life-time of experience in the trade would afford no means of verifying or disputing the results which may be reached by these experts. Disagreements between experts have become proverbial. That they are honest no one doubts, but like honest lawyers they sometimes will see the right in the direction of the largest reward. From all such schemes and devices the business of the country should be saved. The importer, the refiner, and the consumer (those who care to deal honestly) are alike interested in having the duties steady, plain, and simple in their application and honestly collected, so that the rate of duty shall not be one thing to one importer and quite another to his business competitor, nor one rate at one port of entry and quite another rate exacted at some other port.

With all the frauds and abuses practiced under the present law, yet to the experienced dealer its provisions have some meaning and would be reasonably plain and clear if freed from the devices of dishonest men. The real objection to this law is, that in the multitude of its provisions and discriminations it affords too broad a field for the acts of the evil disposed. The better quality is made to appear the worse, to the robbing of the Government and the injury of trade. In this bill now under consideration not one of these evils is even sought to be remedied, but on the contrary every truly objectionable feature of the present law is retained, and, superadded thereto, the process of mystery by the use of the polariscope. Had the object been to devise some scheme whereby frauds upon the revenue could be practiced without fear of detection and the whole sugar trade placed in the hands of the sugar refiners of New York and the very few acting with them, this bill could hardly be improved upon.

The ad valorem principle in the present law is objectionable, as all ad valorem duties are, by affording a temptation to defraud by undervaluation, but undervaluation has not been the great source of fraud or complaint in the execution of the present law; it has been in the color feature, which is retained in its fullness in the proposed law. I give the provisions of the present law and also the provisions of the proposed law relating to the duties on sugar, and submit that they are more than a justification of every objection urged against the change.

In the present law sugar not above No. 7 Dutch standard in color is 1¼ cents per pound and 25 per cent.; sugar above No. 7 and not above No. 10, Dutch standard in color, 2 cents per pound and 25 per cent. of this; sugar above No. 10 and not above No. 13, Dutch standard in color, 2½ cents per pound and 25 per cent. of this; sugar above No. 13 and not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, 2¾ cents per pound and 25 per cent. of this; above No. 16 and not above No. 20,

Dutch standard in color, 3¼ cents per pound and 25 per cent. of this; above No. 20 Dutch standard in color, and on all refined sugar, 4 cents per pound and 25 per cent. of this.

In the proposed law "sugar not above No. 13 Dutch standard in color, and testing by the polariscope not above 82, 2 3 cents per pound." Same in color "and testing by the polariscope not above 87, 2.6 cents per pound." Same in color "and testing above 87 and not above 92, 2.85 cents per pound." Same in color "and testing above 92, 3.1 cents per pound." Above No. 13 and not above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, 3½ cents per pound. Above No. 16 and not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, 4 cents per pound. Above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, and on all refined, 4½ cents per pound.

This bill is named "A bill to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes." Its adoption is urged as a measure of revenue reform and to relieve the consumer from onerous and burdensome taxation. Is this bill honest in its professions or in the professions of its advocates, which proposes to raise from the item of sugar alone the enormous sum of $44,000,000 per annum, and which proposes to tax this item alone from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 more per annum than the present law?

With pepper and salt, sugar is the universal element of every meal of the rich and the poor. Poverty may separate its victim from tea and coffee, but from sugar never while starvation is kept at bay. Every increase of tax upon this article means exaction universal upon one of the necessaries of life. It invades the almshouse and the hovel, and the exaction is more nearly in proportion to the mouths to be filled than upon any other article that can be mentioned. Now, why in the name of revenue reform and reduction of taxation this new exaction upon sugar while silks and velvets, at once the badges of wealth and the costumes solely of the rich, are relieved of a large part of the tax which they now pay? "Judas professed and kissed." The advocates of this measure, alive with professions of relief for the poor laborer from his burdens, further tax his sugar to relieve the silk, the velvet, the lace, that are flaunted before his eyes but gladden not the sight of his wife or daughter.

If this increased tax upon sugar is made necessary or is designed to protect the Louisiana planter, now that he no longer owns but hires his labor, let us have the fact, not any false pretense. If it is true that the sugar planters really require this $6,000,000 or $10,000,000 additional exaction to enable them to pay wages to their late slaves and to prosecute and upbuild this industry, the patriotism of the people, laborer and all, will bear it. They will want the fact openly stated; they will require that you convince their understanding.

In the light of the other provisions of the bill, it looks as if the real purpose of this increased sugar tax is to relieve silks, velvets, laces, broadcloths, and other articles solely enjoyed and consumed by the wealthy and pretentious, and saddle the burden upon the necessaries of life.

If the purpose of this proposed law is not to shift the burdens of taxation from the shoulders of the rich to those of the poor and the comparatively poor, nor to benefit those who design both to defraud the Government of its dues and monopolize the trade in sugar, but is designed to secure revenue to the Government and at the same time afford unprecedented protection to our sugar producers, then in the name of honesty and fair dealing give us some plain and simple specific rate of duties which shall raise the desired revenue and treat the producers, the refiners, the distributers, and the consumers with fairness.

A duty of 2½ cents per pound on all sugar not above No. 16, Dutch standard, in color, and of 3½ or even 4 cents per pound on all above No. 16, Dutch standard, in color would accomplish the object. Under such a tariff the revenue would be collected at a nominal expense by simply weighing the importations and the trade freed from deception and fraud.

This bill provides for the duty on molasses at 6½ cents per gallon, in accordance with the present law, which all agree works well; a simple specific duty of uniform rate. When there was a duty on coffee and on tea and each had a specific, uniform rate, no frauds were complained of, the Government and all parties concerned were satisfied with the workings of the law; yet the differences in qualities and value were far greater than in sugars.

A committee selected from the sugar importers and merchants, composed of as honorable men as it has ever been my good fortune to associate with, made a report upon the sugar tariff early in the present session of Congress. This report contains much valuable information; and, while disagreeing with the committee in regard to the immediate adoption of their entire plan, yet I deem the points set forth so important that I desire to incorporate it as a part of my remarks:

SUGAR: ITS PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

Statement prepared at the Agricultural Department in relation to the production and consumption of sugar in this country, (in tons of 2,240 pounds.)

Years.	Total consumption.	Imported.	Domestics.
1860	415,281	296,250	119,031
1861	363,819	241,420	122,399
1862	432,411	241,411	191,000
1863	284,308	231,398	52,910

Years.	Total consumption.	Imported.	Domestics.
1864	220,660	192,660	28,000
1865	350,809	345,809	5,000
1866	391,678	383,178	8,500

1875	685,352	621,852	63,500
1876	638,309	561,309	77,000

From which tables it appears that, in the years named, the United States produced less than 13 per cent. of the cane sugar it consumed.

The leading sources of our foreign supply are exhibited below. Twenty-one other nations supply the remainder, which is about 3 per cent. of the whole amount:

	Tons.
Cuba	450,000
Spanish possessions	50,000
Porto Rico	30,000
French Islands	22,000
Brazil	18,000
Dutch East Indies	11,000
British West Indies	10,000
British Guiana	10,000
Sandwich Islands	10,000

THE SUGAR TARIFF.

Recent publications of the Treasury Department relative to frauds in the entry of sugar and the discussion of the matter by the newspapers have brought clearly before the public the wrongs which arise from the present tariff law as regards this article.

There is but little in all these publications, however, which offers any practical suggestions for the relief that is urgently demanded. The Treasury officials have fully realized for months past that the revenue was being defrauded; in fact, in 1875, when the last change was made in the law, its operation was explained to the Committee of Ways and Means, and to the present Secretary of the Treasury, then chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate. Since then committees appointed for the purpose of investigating this and kindred subjects in the various ports of entry have unanimously reported to this same effect. These reports brought out "special orders" from the Treasury Department to the various collectors, but these orders have not been and cannot be obeyed while the law remains as it is.

The object of this paper is to show why this is the case, and to offer a plan which we claim will relieve, first, the consumer, who is now paying a large sum in the name of "duty" which never reaches the Treasury; and, second, the Treasury Department, which confessedly cannot collect the duty according to the true intent and meaning of the tariff law.

It is generally known that the present tariff takes as its basis of value of the various grades simply the color of the sugar, and directs the use of certain samples known as "Dutch standards." These samples are made from a peculiar kind of sugar produced in Java by the most primitive process. They were adopted and came into general use many years ago, when this process, known as "claying," was the principal method employed in making sugar from the cane-juice. Since then, of course great improvements in its manufacture have been made, the use of steam and machinery being now the rule instead of the exception. We find that the import of these Java sugars into the United States for the last year was barely 2 per cent. of the whole import, and yet the law directs the use of these samples in the grading of the whole.

From this arises the difficulty, we may say the impossibility, of properly levying and collecting the duty upon the article, for it assumes the color to be the test of intrinsic quality, as it was in this old and almost obsolete process of manufacture, while under the new and improved processes color is no test whatever of quality. Pure sugar can be made of any desired shade, and can be, and of course is, varied to meet any tariff in which color is the standard for grading.

From the above statement it will be seen that no tariff which adopts color as the basis for grading sugar can be framed so that it cannot be, as now, readily evaded strictly within the letter of the law.

Chemical tests of course show true intrinsic qualities, and are now almost universally used by buyer and seller in all the markets of the world. We fear, however, they would be found impracticable as a basis for levying duties. A laboratory in every custom-house is hardly to be recommended as a cure for the present evils.

Another suggestion which has been made is the adoption of two grades of sugar, one "raw" and one "refined," with specific rates for each, but this we regard as thoroughly impracticable also, from the difficulty of determining what is "refined sugar." All sugar is to some extent refined; the first boiling of the cane-juice is a refining process, and all subsequent processes are unquestionably "refining." Who shall decide just how far they shall be carried, and what two appraisers will agree on this point? The act of March 2, 1861, was framed on this basis, and the records will show no end of claims and disputes arising from this very point. No two collectors agreed, and sugar which paid ¾ of a cent per pound duty in one port paid 2 cents in another.

A careful examination of the foregoing will, we believe, lead any disinterested person to the conclusion which we have arrived at, that there is but one way open to our legislators in order to secure for the Government and for the people a fair and equitable collection of the revenue from this most important article of import, and that is a single uniform rate of duty upon all sugar of whatsoever kind or quality. Two cents per pound would yield a revenue of nearly $30,000,000 per annum, which is about as much as is now received from this article. At the same time we believe there would be a saving to the consumer of at least one-half as much as that sum. In other words the cost of sugar to the consumer under this simple tariff would be at least 1 cent per pound less than it is under the present tariff. Can we afford to lose sight of so important an item in the present condition of labor in this country?

The refiners as a class will probably oppose this reform on the ground that it is unfair to their industry. We think, however, we can show that their position is an independent one. The natural differences in the product as it comes from the cane, beet, or date-palm make their work necessary. We all know that sugar is not produced to any appreciable extent in a condition fitted for consumption. All classes now demand, and properly so, cleaned or "refined" sugar, and there can be no doubt that the supplying of this demand will always be a large and profitable industry, as it has been in the past. Great Britain imports nearly one-third more sugar than the United States, and this is of all kinds and grades, from the finest Paris loaves to the blackest date sugar, without any discrimination in duty, all being "free." We find there as large and flourishing refineries as any in the world, and of course they work simply under the natural differences in the raw material above referred to. As a proof that our refiners would certainly be as favorably situated under similar circumstances, we quote from a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury printed in the New York Journal of Commerce of August 30, 1877, signed by "the sugar refiners of New York," as follows: "We assert that the processes, methods, and apparatus employed in the refining of sugars in this country are not surpassed, if indeed equaled, elsewhere;" "the increased exportation of sugar is due to the greater facilities enjoyed by our refiners in geographical position, unsurpassed machinery, and profitable demand for moist sugar." There is no doubt this is entirely true.

We may say further that with this uniform tariff the protection to the Louisiana planters would be more certain and consequently more satisfactory than it is under the present tariff, which we have shown cannot be enforced. They would benefit surely to the extent of the 2 cents per pound. If they were doing that now there would be no sense in the recent orders of the Treasury Department concerning the frauds.

Whether the reduction of duties on the manufactures of iron is wise or not I will not attempt to discuss here, for I know this subject will be ably handled by others more particularly interested; but why the committee should retain the duty on boiler flues and tubes at 3½ cents per pound, said to be equal to 86 per cent. ad valorem, while other manufactures of iron are reduced to 35 per cent. ad valorem, is a mystery not yet explained, and I apprehend no effort will be made to explain what overshadowing influence was brought to bear upon them to produce this great inequality. If this high rate is prohibitory, as I understand it is, they certainly cannot plead that revenue is the object.

It is painfully apparent that the raising of revenue was not of paramount importance with this committee. They propose to have a duty of 20 cents per bushel on wheat and admit wheat flour free of duty! Can the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] the chairman of the committee, believe there will be any revenue from this source? Flour will come into the country from the Dominion across the border in abundance, and very little, if any, wheat. Whatever the object, such legislation will be a grievous wrong to the millers of this country.

Has the term "protection to home industry" become so offensive that the committee must strike so severe a blow as this at one of the great industries of the country, in which immense capital is employed, with such meager remuneration as barely to keep the proprietors from entering the list of that still increasing throng which is seeking relief in the courts of bankruptcy? To be consistent they propose a tax on rice and to allow rice flour to come in free of duty; but when they come to rye, that grand old cereal that has refreshed so many, a change comes over the spirit of their dreams; upon both rye and rye flour a duty is imposed.

Says a writer in a recent number of the Philadelphia North American:

> During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the duty on rye flour yielded a revenue of 45 cents. If the country needs revenue so badly as to make an article dutiable to secure 45 cents in a whole year, why were potatoes made free? During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, potatoes yielded a revenue of $472,918, nearly a half million dollars.

I cannot account for this singular discrimination between wheat flour and rye flour, unless it is the intention of the committee to have no more rye spoiled by grinding it into flour.

Mr. Speaker, as unwise as I deem this bill in the particulars to which I have referred, the great danger will be found in a single clause in the first paragraph, that "all merchandise not herein provided for shall be free of duty." That two-thirds in number of the articles upon which a duty is now collectable should be at once transferred to the free list, is alarming. I believe the free list should be enlarged, but every article on such list should be distinctly stated. This omision will not only prevent the establishment of new industries, but, as has been well stated, will lead to "subterfuges, evasions, endless litigation, and incalculable loss of revenue. On the one hand nothing can be easier than to give a new name, or a little-used name not mentioned in the tariff to an old article. On the other hand, any new industry aiming to produce, in competition with foreigners, some article not known to commerce would be suppressed, honest importers would be discouraged and foreign commerce would tend to pass into the hands of a class of smugglers created by law."

Gentlemen will honestly differ in opinion in regard to the probable effect upon the country these radical changes in the tariff will produce; but for myself, believing that the effect will be injurious at the present time, I must vote against the bill.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU TO WAR DEPAETMENT.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Indian Affairs have reported a bill (H. R. No. 3541) to transfer the Office of Indian Affairs to the War Department. Representing as I do a constituency vitally interested in a proper settlement of that question I should be derelict in duty if I failed to give my reasons for advocating the bill, and I take this opportunity to do so; and what I have to say will not be the expression of sentiments drawn from Cooper's works of fiction, read in my boyhood, nor from Longfellow's metrical imaginings, but from the lessons taught by thirty-seven years' experience in the frontier settlements of our country and among the Indian tribes.

In judging of the question before the committee we must consider it by the light of experience. We must analyze the Indian character and find if possible a remedy for the evils that exist in the administration of Indian affairs; ascertain, if we can, why the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been appropriated by the nation in the endeavor to elevate and Christianize the Indians has produced no beneficial result, except in a few isolated cases, during nearly thirty years' experience since the control of the Indians was transferred from the War to the Interior Department; why we find to-day that the whole frontier settlements of the country are in a state of feverish excitement, growing out of the known fact that one-half the tribes and bands of Indians in the new States and Territories are counseling among themselves and with the neighboring tribes and laying their plans for hostilities accompanied with all the horrors of their savage warfare.

No sickly sentimentality will solve this question. The cry that it is better to feed than to fight the Indians has produced its legitimate fruits of murder and devastation.

Your system of farming out the Indian agencies to different religious denominations in order to bring the Indians under Christianizing influences as a means of civilization has only resulted in depopulating reservations and producing Indian hostilities, while your religious agents and religious teachers have plundered the Indians, plundered the Government, and produced naught but discord and disorganization by attempting to force their peculiar religious faith upon savages and barbarous or partly civilized people. The fact should not be forgotten that the whole Indian race, by all their traditions, taught them from their childhood, are impressed with the belief that the height of human virtue is to deprive their enemies of their property and take their lives, whether these enemies be the white race or the surrounding Indian tribes; that they all look upon and feel the white race to be their natural enemy; that before you can have the respect of an Indian he must feel that in some respect you are his superior. These facts are known and felt by every man who has had personal experience with the Indian race.

A single Indian, or body of them, when treating with an individual of the white race, if they are impressed with his superiority, if they find he never makes a promise in express terms or by implication that he does not fulfill, and especially never makes a threat he does not enforce, not only obtains at once their respect and confidence, but he retains it as long as his conduct justifies their appreciation of his character. Your peace policy, that has been profuse in promises never fulfilled, that has been administered by men who pray long and loud, and while they prate of the love and kind wishes of "the Great Father" at Washington, steal the appropriations made for their benefit, and attempt to coerce them into the religious faith of the agent or teacher, who, when they threaten fail to enforce their threats; who, when the Indians are importunate and threaten reprisal and destruction if their demands are not complied with, yield to their demands as the price of peace and quietude, only to see the same demands repeated as their greed is pampered, not only have the supreme contempt of the Indians, but subject the Government, whose agents they are, to like contempt.

The Indians on our western frontiers who have endeavored to improve themselves, who are striving to be self-sustaining, who have profited by the examples of the early missionaries, who practiced what they preached, and the early pioneers who with those missionaries taught them by example the blessings of industry, have been totally neglected under the policy of the last few years, until it has become proverbial among the Indians that those who endeavor to assist themselves receive no assistance from the Government, while the turbulent and threatening reptiles are pampered in their idleness. How can this state of affairs be remedied? The answer is plain and simple: by turning the Indian Bureau over to the War Department. The power will then be at hand to enforce obedience. The mass of the machinery will be in the hands of men who have had experience with Indian character in frontier service, who will make pledges to be fulfilled and threats, if you please, or rules and regulations (if the term better suits the fastidious) to be enforced.

The men who have been schooled in military service will have no desire to perform the duties devolving upon them in the Indian service longer than there is a public necessity for the performance of those duties, and they will endeavor to hasten the day when the Indians under their charge will no longer stand in the relation of the nation's wards, but will be ready and anxious to assume the duties and responsibilities of citizens, while your agents under the present system endeavor eternally to keep the Indians in their present state of dependence in order to continue their power and their opportunities for plunder. There will then be no more mythical Téton Sioux requiring immediate and enormous appropriations to be disbursed by a "Vial" of holiness under the instructions of an immaculate Secretary of the Interior and in the interest of pious fraud.

The Christianizing influences will not be ignored. Schools, industrial habits, and honest Christian missionary labor will be fostered. The vital subject of improving the Indian race and making them self-sustaining will be enforced by the Government, and the appropriations for that purpose, under stringent rules of immediate prosecution and swift and merited punishment that characterize courts-martial in military service, will insure an honest administration of affairs. And last, but not least, the high character of the officers who will be detailed for the Indian service will render the administration of Indian affairs a credit to the nation—not an outrage and a disgrace, as has been the case for a long term of years.

Mr. Speaker, our Indian policy has been radically wrong from its inception. It has been an anomaly, a monstrous incongruity, a burlesque upon us as a nation.

The policy of treating savage tribes within the limits of our Government as independent nations, making solemn treaties with them as with civilized nations, allowing them all the attributes of sovereignty, and while doing so considering them as the nation's wards, to be supported in idleness, will always interpose a barrier to the advancement of the Indians in civilization. Let the reservation system and tribal authority be abrogated as soon as possible. Give every Indian, whether within or without a reservation, the same right to the enjoyment of the privileges of the homestead laws as white citizens. Let their land be inalienable and non-taxable for a term of years, say fifteen or twenty; break up your reservations as soon as possible, and with them all tribal relations. Give the Indians the first chance for selecting homesteads on the reservations so broken up. Make every Indian when he is outside a reservation totally amenable to the State or territorial laws, civil or criminal, general or municipal, of the State or Territory in which he may be located, except that his homesteads shall be inalienable and non-taxable for a term of years.

The suicidal policy that has been adopted and enforced by the Interior Department under your peace policy of making the Indian agencies, the United States forces in the field, and the military posts, "cities of refuge," for the protection of red-handed, indiscriminate murderers of men, women and children, the brutal outragers of mothers and daughters—committing their crimes, not in a state of war, but by stealth, in peaceful communities—to which the fiends can flee and have protection against trial and punishment for their crimes, has only been a premium offered to outrage, crime and bloodshed.

It is said—

> "The fear o' hell's a hangman's whip,
> To hau'd the wretch in order."

And the fear of certain and exemplary punishment for crime alone will restrain the brutal, be they of the white or Indian race.

Let the Indian become a citizen as soon as qualified and assume the responsibilities of such citizenship, and you will invest him with attributes that will make him proud of his position. He will consider that by holding his property in severalty there is an inducement for industry, and the Indian will soon be absorbed in the body-politic, and I trust that the practical good sense that will characterize the administration of Indian affairs by the War Department will soon solve the Indian question in the only way it ever can be solved, by causing the Indians to become self-sustaining, "earning their daily bread by the sweat of the brow," as large numbers of them are now doing in Idaho and Washington Territories, without Government assistance, as I know they are, and as I presume is being done in many other sections of our broad domain. Upon the breaking up of reservations, remove the few, if any, who will not occupy lands in severalty or adopt the habits of civilized life, to some locality specially provided for them, so that those who are willing to improve their condition or have it improved will not be hampered and annoyed by the worthless.

But let me say that when with them it comes to choosing between removing from their kindred and from the graves of their fathers or following the example of the industrious and self-sustaining, you will find but few who will not choose the latter alternative. The whole system as now conducted under the auspices of the Interior Department only proves the ignorance or willful disregard of duties that characterize its administration. Take the case of Indian inspectors, whose duty theoretically is to inspect the accounts at the various agencies, ascertain causes of complaint, and correct abuses, but practically with few exceptions has been to whitewash villainous officials and shield them from deserved punishment for their infamy. One of them clothed with his mantle of authority arrives at an agency, the time of his arrival well known by the agent in advance and unknown to any one who could give evidence of the agent's mismanagement. The inspector is the favored guest of the agent, who has everything prepared for his arrival. He examines his books, pronounces them correct.

The Indians about the agency are called together, the agent present. The inspector informs the Indians assembled that he is sent there by "the Great Father" to look after their interests; states to them that if they have any complaints to make regarding their agent, or upon any other subject, that now is the time to make them known. A silence as of the tomb is the response. No matter if every duty of the agent had been disregarded; no matter if he had swindled or outraged them; no matter if he had been faithless to every pledge, not one of the assembled Indians would dare make complaint, as he would know from sad experience that one word of criticism of the agent's conduct, the statement of one fact tending to show his stealings, his petty persecutions, his disregard of his plighted word, or any matter of maladministration, would only work him irreparable injury, by causing him and his to be further outraged in the name of God, Christianity, and the Government, at the hands of his imperial majesty, the Indian agent, as soon as the time-serving inspector had taken his departure.

In a word, the checks and guards intended for securing faithful, administration as at present executed, are only carefully devised plans for screening culprits and misleading the American people as to the facts regarding the Indian service. A case in point, showing the power and baleful influence of an evil-disposed agent who feels and knows that every step taken toward rendering Indians self-sustaining, breaking up tribal relations, and absorbing them in the body-politic cripples his power and capacity for evil, has within the last few weeks occurred among the Nez Percés. The mass of the Indians remaining on their reservation after the late exodus of the hostiles were anxious to greatly reduce the dimensions of or break up their reservation and homestead their lands and become citizens. They desired a petition to Congress to be translated into the Nez Percé language, that every Indian might fully understand the full purport of the petition. The Indian agent would not permit the interpreter, Mr. Whitman, who has a perfect knowledge of the language, to translate it. And those of Indian blood on the reservation who were capable of making a full and correct translation of the petition, and were in full harmony with its purposes, were restrained from so doing by fear of the agent's power.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot too strongly condemn the unconstitutional practice that has grown up in the administration of Indian affairs, of farming out the various Indian agencies to different religious denominations and allowing the church authorities of such denominations to name the agent to serve at each agency, and which extends to a great degree to the highest officers in the Indian service.

The Constitution of the United Ststes provides that the President "shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint" public officers of the United States.

The grasping church authorities of different religious denominations, ever anxious for power, have been gratified in their wish to connect the churches with the administration of national affairs until, in this respect, they perform the constitutional duty of the President of the United States, and he is but a figure-head to announce their will.

That there may be no misunderstanding on this subject and to show that the unconstitutional action is officially avowed, I quote from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the year 1877, page 246, the heading of a table or schedule, covering four pages of that report, as follows: "Schedule showing the names of Indian reservations in the United States; agencies; denominations nominating agents; tribes occupying or belonging to the reservations; area of each reservation in square miles and acres; and reference to treaty, law, or other authority by which the reservation was established." These three words "denominations nominating agents" show who perform the constitutional duties of the President; show a usurpation of power at war with the letter and spirit of the charter of our liberties. The result is that men who have had life-long experience with the Indian race and understand thoroughly their character and who are the proper persons to perform the duties of Indian agent and who alone will understand not only their duties but all the peculiarities of character in the Indians under their charge, and thereby control them successfully, are totally ignored; none of them are in the service for which their qualifications and experience peculiarly fits them.

The office of Indian agent at nearly one hundred established agencies is filled by men totally unfitted for the service, whose only knowledge of Indians is drawn from fancy sketches, who are totally devoid of experience in frontier life or Indian character; who know as little about the intricate duties devolving upon them as the devil does about the abode of saints, and who is held in the position that he disgraces by the church which nominates him. Evidence may be piled mountain-high of the inefficiency, the intolerance, the corrupt practices of the favored representative of the church; he will still be retained until there is a harvest of blood and rapine, and often thereafter until the same scenes are repeated.

In this connection let me say, Mr. Speaker, that in the ninth section of the bill under consideration is embodied a fundamental principle which will remedy one of the greatest evils attending the present administration of Indian affairs. The section is as follows:

> SEC. 9. That it is hereby provided that all religious denominations shall enjoy a free and equal right to erect and maintain church and school buildings on any and all Indian reservations, and shall not be molested in their religious or philanthropic efforts to advance the Indians in moral, religious, or literary culture, but shall equally and alike be perfectly free and encouraged in the prosecution of their civilizing and educational efforts.

Under the present system of farming out the agencies to different denominations, most of the denominational authorities, prompted by their greed and love of power, have striven to secure the control of as many agencies as possible, without regard to the prevalent faith among those occupying or assigned to such reservations, and their tools when in charge have often depopulated the reservations by their bigotry and intolerance and endeavors to coerce the untutored Indians to adopt the faith of the denomination in charge.

Experience proves that the more ignorant a people the stronger their religious prejudices. Indians are no exception to the rule, and the effort of the bigot to compel them to renounce the religion of their ancestors or renounce any faith they may have embraced will fail unless induced to do so, as they only can be, by the exercise of true Christian love, charity, good works, and practicing what they preach by the self-sacrificing missionary who goes among them as a messenger of peace, not as a plunderer, or a representative of the demon persecution, of whom 'tis said

> "Ambition's self, though mad
> And nursed on human gore, with her
> Compared is merciful."

Every Indian driven from a reservation by the bigotry or injustice of an agent, or his tools, becomes a wanderer and a renegade and is prepared to steal, rob, or murder and to enter into hostile combinations with any of his race and prey upon any of the white race, whom he looks upon as his natural enemy, and with justice, when we consider that none of the promises of love and charity with which the agent, the representative of the Government, heralds his coming, is ever fulfilled, and instead thereof he meets intolerance and injustice. When every denomination of Christians has an equal opportunity to exert itself in civilizing efforts there will be no further field for the bigot theologian described by Scotland's pure and holy bard, as a man who believed—

"His vain conceits were orthodox alone."

Nor for the hypocrite strikingly described by the same word-painter

"He was a man
Who stole the livery of the court of Heaven
To serve the devil in; in virtue's guise
Devoured the widow's house and orphan's bread;
In holy phrase transacted villainies
That common sinners durst not meddle with;
At sacred feast he sat among the saints,
And with his guilty hands touched holiest things;
And none of sin lamented more, or sighed
More deeply, or with graver countenance
Or longer prayers wept o'er the dying man Whose infant children, at the moment, he Planned how to rob."

But the missionary will be proved by his works, and their efficacy will depend entirely on the character of their endeavors, and appropriations for civilizing purposes will only be dispensed to those who prove their usefulness. To prove that such a result may be reached, that there is no obstacle in the way of rendering the Indian not only self-sustaining, but a useful member of the community in which he lives, I will take the case of the Cœur d'Alêne Indians in my own Territory, Idaho. The Cœur d'Alênes number about five hundred and fifty, who, with a few exceptions, are residing in Idaho, near the line of Washington Territory, and between the forty-seventh and forty-eighth parallels of north latitude. The missionary labors of Father De Smeet and his colaborers eventuated in the establishment of a Jesuit mission among them about 1843. They have faithfully labored in their behalf from that time to the present, and with the adjoining tribes. Now for the result. Notwithstanding the fact that the Government of the United States never expended one dollar for their benefit, they are all self-sustaining farmers and stock-raisers, living in good houses of their own construction. The best church in the Territory was built by their own mechanics, under the direction of the Jesuit fathers, raising a surplus of grain beyond their own wants, and peaceful and quiet.

They have never desired an agent, but have protested against such an intruder to plunder or outrage them; but they have long asked for a small appropriation for the building of a flouring-mill, saw-mill, school-houses, and the support of schools, in consideration of their never raising any objection to the white settlers occupying a large portion of the country formerly occupied by them; but they have asked and implored in vain—another proof that no encouragement under the present peace policy has been or will be extended to the worthy and industrious of the Indian race, while the blood-thirsty hell-hound, too lazy to work, but with a vocabulary of threats, has been pampered and furnished the very means by which he has been enabled to devastate settlements and effect indiscriminate murder and rapine. These Cœur d'Alênes, taught by the Jesuit fathers by precept and example the benefits of industry, peace, good-will, and the Christian virtues, have for a long term of years lived on the most amicable terms with the white settlers in their immediate neighborhood, the white settlers having protected them on one occasion from being trespassed upon by white men who desired to take possession of land which the Cœur d'Alênes occupied for their own special use, by driving the trespassers from the settlements. These Indians are employed by their white neighbors at remunerative wages, and prove themselves valuable aids in developing the resources of the country.

Last summer, when the Nez Percé war broke out and there was imminent danger of the emissaries from the Nez Percés involving the Spokanes and other tribes in the conflict, and a white man had been killed by renegade Indians but a few miles from the main settlement of the Cœur d'Alênes, and the white settlers in their unprotected state abandoned their homes, leaving household goods and all their effects unprotected and their growing crops subject to destruction, the Cœur d'Alênes became the protectors of the abandoned property of the settlers and guarded it fully and completely until the return of the owners.

In contrast with the present enormous outlays in the Indian service, with the blood and treasure annually expended, I desire to call the attention of the committee to our experience on the Pacific coast in the early days of the original transfer of Indian affairs from the War to the Interior Department while the old system was still bearing its fruits, and before church dictation and corrupt agents and contractors, protected by church authorities assumed control.

In 1850 that noble statesman, Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, then Secretary of the Interior, appointed as superintendent of Indian affairs for the northwestern coast Dr. Anson Dart, who understood the character of the Indians and their peaceful and economical management. Not the slightest trouble or difficulty occurred during the three years of his superintendency. In all that extensive region, and with thirty thousand Indians under his control, peace and harmony prevailed during his term. Expenses caused by Indian disturbances were unknown, compared with the present administration of Indian affairs. This chapter requires no comment.

The Cœur d'Alênes who reside outside their main settlement desire to homestead their lands under the land laws. Many of their neighbors, the Spokanes and other bands, desire to do the same.

Attempts were made in August last by Indian Inspector Watkins to make arrangements with the non-reservation Indians in Eastern Washington and Northern Idaho to go upon reservations. A large portion of the Indians met in council and many more, having no faith in the professions and promises of the Government's representations, refused or failed to meet the inspector; of those assembled large numbers desired to avail themselves of the benefits of the homestead laws and assume the duties of citizens. The inspector endeavored to impress upon them the benefits that would result to them and theirs by going upon a reservation and becoming Government paupers, but with little effect. He talked long with them about the dangers of their being left to the mercies of the white settlers, but experience had taught them that danger to them and their rights was not to be feared from the pioneers, but from the greedy agents of the Government, so profuse in promises of good-will and temporal and spiritual benefits never fulfilled.

Among those desiring to avail themselves of the benefits of the land laws and become citizens were some Cœur d'Alênes living outside their principal settlement, the upper and middle Spokanes, the Colville band of Pend d'Oreilles, and many others who will never be forced to abandon their farms and go upon reservations without resistance. I am rejoiced to see in the press and hear from his own lips that Major-General Howard, commanding the Department of the Columbia, favors homesteading and opposes forcing these Indians to leave their farms and property. The most powerful chief in all that country, Moses, took no part in the council, and many others only to make known their wants and wishes, and I say to this House, as I have already made known to the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that if the policy mapped out of compelling the Indians named to go either upon the Yacima or Colville reservation is enforced it will inaugurate an Indian war that will dwarf the Nez Percé war of last summer into a secondary matter.

And allow me to express the hope that Congress in its wisdom may encourage the Cœur d'Alênes and the adjoining tribes in their efforts for advancement by complying with their modest request and showing to them that their laudable efforts are appreciated.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to Senate Executive Document No. 29, of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, of date January 23, 1878, in which Inspector Watkins makes recommendations for consolidating agencies in Oregon and Washington Territory, in which he takes occasion to say:

> But in all cases, on all the reservations to be vacated, when Indians are farming and self-supporting I would recommend that they may be allowed and encouraged to remain in their present location, securing their title to their lands under the act above referred to, [homestead act.]

Colonel Watkins has been forced to admit the strength of the homestead argument in reservation cases, but is not willing to admit its force and justice where Indians by their own efforts and the examples of pioneers have become self-sustaining without an agent, showing too plainly that he desires to perpetuate the present vicious system. I profoundly regret that the recommendations of Inspector Watkins as to the propriety of allowing Indians to homestead and break up tribal relations and reservations, even to the limited extent advocated by him, does not meet the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as shown by the following extract from the letter of Commissioner Hayt, a part of said executive document:

> I entertain no doubt of the advisability of consolidating these Indians. I am clearly of the opinion, however, that it will be unwise policy to encourage those Indians who are now farming to remain in their present location. They should all be consolidated upon the reservation selected, and the title which may be given to them in severalty should be made inalienable. The experience which has heretofore attended the granting of individual titles to Indians in localities where they are surrounded by the whites, versed in all the machinations by which the Indians are systematically circumvented and ruined in property and discouraged in civilization, compels me to disapprove of so much of Inspector Watkins's recommendation as is included in brackets on pages — and — of said copy of his report quoted above.

I can only ascribe the failure of this high official of the Government to appreciate the propriety of the recommendations for Indian homesteading, holding property in severalty, and assuming the duties of citizens, to his want of knowledge of the relations existing between the pioneers and the Indians, and of the true character of the Indian race, which can only be obtained from experience and long-continued association; not from the fancy pictures of Indian virtues, habits, and wants, and the demoralized condition of their white neighbors on the frontiers, drawn by the sickly sentimentalist or the church authorities, who will raise their hands to heaven in holy horror at any innovation that will tend to circumscribe their power or reduce their plunder. But pass the bill under consideration, accept the homestead citizenship and self-sustaining Indian policy, and you will finally dispose of the Indian question in the real interests of peace, economy, and correct principles of government. So far I have dealt with this subject on general principles.

I now desire to bring to the support of my argument the facts as to the working of the present system in the Territory of Idaho, which I have the honor to represent on this floor, and in the eastern portion of Washington Territory, which has fallen specially under my observation for some years. In Southeastern Idaho we have the Fort Hall reservation, provided for the Shoshones and Bannacks, which for several years has had liberal appropriations from the Government. It was assigned to the Methodist church, although there were no Methodists among the Indians within its limits or among those expected to be removed or settled there. Faithful Roman Catholic fathers had long prior thereto established a mission among them. Large numbers had embraced that faith, and were rapidly advancing in civilization without one dollar expense for them or aid from the Government. Now for the sequel; instead of the Christianizing and civilizing efforts of your religious peace-policy having produced any beneficial results, notwithstanding large appropriations for that purpose, there are not one-half as many Indians on the reservation as there were located within its limits when the same was established.

None of the thousands who were expected to be located or removed there are to be found upon the reservation. Those driven off are scattered abroad, creating discord, robbing, stealing, and begging, a source of alarm to the settlers over one-third of Idaho; not only threatening hostilities at the reservation, and throughout the country, but they have actually commenced their murders. Troops have been hurriedly assembled there to protect life and property, and a general outbreak is imminent and will only be averted by the presence of a large military force, or by the removal of the cause, namely, the present agent, held there by his church, and a change of policy, as in this bill provided, that will remove the root of the present deplorable state of affairs. At the Lemhi agency, in Eastern Idaho, we are blessed with Rev. Mr. Stowers, who by his want of knowledge of Indian character, his stealings, plundering, and general unfaithfulness, and inefficiency has driven one-half the Indians from the reservation in the last ten months, who are threatening to return with torch and rifle.

The white settlers in the county alarmed, are stockading, and steps are being taken to station troops for their protection, and nothing but a speedy change will arrest a bloody dénouement.

I now come to a commentary upon the present policy that would to God I had been spared the duty of making. I refer to the late Nez Percé war and its causes and the present state of that afflicted country, and the imminent dangers of another war in Northern Idaho and Eastern Washington that will dwarf the late Nez Percé war into comparative insignificance. This agency was assigned to the Presbyterians when the unholy system of farming out reservations to churches was inaugurated. A Presbyterian mission had been established within what is now the Nez Percé reservation some forty years ago, by Rev. Mr. Spaulding, a worthy missionary, who labored long and ardently for the advancement of the Nez Percés. At the time the system of farming out the agencies to church organizations was inaugurated, there were as many Methodists as Presbyterians among the Nez Percés, and more Catholics than either.

Under the blighting church influence, J. B. Monteith was appointed agent in February, 1871. From the day of his entering upon his duties as agent he commenced sowing the seeds that during the summer of 1877 produced their harvest of Indian war and desolation. On the 13th, 14th, and 15th of June last twenty of my neighbors, men, women, and children, were horribly murdered by the Nes Percé Indians. Wives and mothers were outraged by the brutal fiends. Large numbers escaped, wounded and disabled, to carry with them through life an evidence of Indian mercy when scourged to madness by outrages perpetrated by their Indian agent. The country was laid waste. The loss of life among our citizens in Northern Idaho in defending their homes and families; the murders and devastation in the Territory of Montana and in the county of Lemhi, Idaho Territory, while on their march; the heavy losses of life by the United States Army in the field and among the citizen soldiery of Idaho and Montana; the enormous expense incurred in the conflicts, are familiar to this House and the country.

And I here proclaim upon this floor, and I speak from personal knowledge, that in my opinion and in the opinion of nearly every man who lives anywhere in the vicinity of the scenes of hostilities in Northern Idaho, I may say every man except a few who have been the tools and parasites of the agent, said J. B. Monteith, the United States Indian agent for the Nez Percés, was the primary cause of every drop of blood that was shed and of every dollar's destruction of property and every dollar's expense either by the Government or by individuals in the course of the Nez Percé war; unless it should be considered he was but a tool in the hands of the Presbyterian Missionary Society, and, if so, he may divide with them the responsibility. This may appear strange to persons who are not cognizant of the facts, but such will be the record made by the impartial historian.

I will as briefly as possible give the facts as they existed, as they will prove a stronger argument in behalf of the pending measure than volumes of theory. Until the advent of J. B. Monteith among them as agent the Nez Percés had been proverbially peaceful and the friends of the white settlers. Very few difficulties had ever occurred between the whites and the Indians. They were considerably advanced in civilization. Large numbers of them were farmers, nearly all stock-raisers, and many laboring faithfully for the white settlers at remunerative wages. I have not time to detail all his iniquities fully, but I will say he first commenced a bitter warfare upon the old missionary, Rev. Mr. Spaulding, who was beloved by the mass of the tribe of every faith, and followed the onslaught upon him by an equally bitter warfare upon Rev. Mr. Cowle, Presbyterian missionary, beloved by the Indians under his charge, until he was driven from his field of labor, and is now proving his usefulness among the Spokanes without Government aid. He (Monteith) bitterly opposed allowing Catholic services on the reservation, although they were the most numerous denomination of Christians located on the reservation and of those who lived without its limits.

Money was raised for building a Catholic church upon the reservation—much of it furnished by persons not of the Catholic faith, the donors knowing full well that the Catholic missionaries ever labored in behalf of peace, quietude, and good-will. Agent Monteith refused to allow the church to be built. Then followed a long correspondence with the Interior Department, the agent denying the right of the Catholics to erect the church, and protesting against it, resulting in an order from the Indian department directing that Father Cataldo, the priest in charge, should be allowed to erect a "church and necessary missionary buildings on the Nez Percés reservation."

The church was erected some seven miles from the agency. Soon thereafter steps were taken to erect a school-house near the church. This was met by an order from Agent Monteith not to erect the school-house, claiming it was not "a necessary missionary building." Only another proof that the workings of the present system tend to keep the Indians in ignorance, and its object is power and plunder.

He has persecuted the Methodists, and allowed his father, a Presbyterian minister and employé of his at the agency, without reproof or reparation, to threaten with uplifted cane and drive from a church at the agency, built by Government funds for the use of the Indians for their purposes of worship, a native Methodist Indian preacher, named Timothy, a talented and worthy son of an important chief, who was an early convert to Christianity under the missionary labors of Rev. Mr. Spaulding, simply because, in the course of his sermon, he (Timothy) saw fit to claim tolerance for his faith in common with others. But the crowning infamy of Monteith was his base and slanderous charges made to the Interior Department, in the early part of the year 1877, against the Reverend Father Cataldo, the priest at the Nez Percé Catholic mission, for the purpose of excluding him from the reservation, that he was using his influence to keep Joseph and the non-treaty Indians who were without the reservation from coming thereon, and that he was stirring up dissensions; all of which he, Monteith, was compelled to admit at a council held with the Nez Percés in May last, in presence of General Howard, was false in every particular. He has continually evidenced favoritism in the distribution of annuities, pampering a few parasites at the expense of the tribe; interfered with the election of chiefs, and used his power to elect his tools; been false to every pledge made by which, in the early part of his administration, he induced Indians residing without the reservation to leave or dispose of farms and come upon the reservation. He has thrown every obstacle in the way of good, self-sustaining Nez Percé Indians (farmers living outside the reservation) homesteading their farms under the acts of Congress; has procured orders from the Interior Department for the removal from their well-cultivated farms on the reservation by military force of Joseph Craig and others, self-sustaining, half-breed Indians, who possess all their tribal rights under a false construction of the provisions of section 2119, because they would not become his instruments, but endeavored to secure his removal in the interest of the tribe, and under such orders some of them have been deprived of their farms, the proceeds of their own labor.

The most aggravated case is that of Mr. Craig, just mentioned, a half-breed son of Colonel William Craig, by a Nez Percé wife, who has a full-blood Indian wife and several children, a valuable improved farm, with good orchard, house, and out-buildings, all the proceeds of his own labor, who has always possessed great influence over his Indian brethren and has the confidence and respect of the white citizens.

In July, 1876, Agent Monteith procured an order from the Interior Department for the removal of said Craig from the reservation, and directing the military authorities to be called in if necessary to enforce the order. From the time Craig was informed of the existence of the order all incitements for industry were paralyzed, not knowing at what hour himself and family might be deprived of his property and home and sent forth wanderers without the means of support, the agent meanwhile threatening to enforce the order.

A fit commentary upon the spirit of persecution and wanton vindictiveness that controlled the agent in his action, both in the case of Craig and Father Cataldo, and a sufficient vindication of the character and standing of each, is found in the fact that as soon as the Nez Percés commenced hostilities, and the situation was fully appreciated by the military authorities, Father Cataldo and Mr. Craig were specially deputed by them, with the acquiesence of Agent Monteith, and Inspector Watkins, to visit the Spokanes and other northern and western tribes and endeavor to restrain them from yielding to the appeals of the emissaries of the hostile Nez Percés and uniting their fortunes with them, by which one thousand warriors would be added to their force.

The danger was imminent, the situation critical, but these two persecuted individuals, with their powerful influence, by their protestations and appeals, restrained the passions of the Indians and averted the danger.

Notwithstanding the services of Mr. Craig, the order for his removal from the reservation remained in force until, upon my second representation of the case to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it was rescinded on the 19th of January last; and only six weeks ago I received a copy of a newspaper published but twenty miles from the residence of Mr. Craig containing the information that on the 5th of February last the Commissioner of Indian Affairs telegraphed to Agent Monteith "that he was at liberty to remove Craig or not at his discretion."

Jacob, an ex-head-chief of the Nez Percés, while he held that position was threatened by Agent Monteith with the withholding of his salary as head-chief provided for by treaty, for which appropriation had been made by Congress, because he exercised his rights and petitioned for the agent's removal, and Jacob now lies a prisoner at Fort Alcatraz, as is believed, not for any crime, but a victim of the agent's power. There is no evidence, so far as I can ascertain, that he was guilty of a single improper or hostile act, except that he went from the Lapwai Nez Percé agency to the Kamai subagency, about thirty-four miles distant, where his wife and children and property were and in danger of being destroyed by the hostiles, then in force but a few miles distant, to protect his family, and in so doing disobeyed an order, made by the agent upon a visit by him to Lapwai on business, "that he should not leave there," made, I have no doubt, for the purpose of gratifying his vindictive feelings toward said Jacob, knowing that Jacob's fears for the safety of his family would make him disobey the order, thus giving him (Monteith) an opportunity to wreak his vengeance.

I have only referred to a very few of the acts of oppression and unfaithfulness that have produced their legitimate results. I have passed over his efforts to rob the heirs of William Craig of a valuable Oregon donation claim, reserved to them by treaty; his efforts to deprive white way-station keepers, provided for by treaty for the convenience of the traveling public, of their property without proper compensation; his outrages upon the private owners of the Lapwai Mission property, and his invoking and obtaining the aid of the military in each case, and especially to annul the action and decrees of courts in the last-named case, and rob men of their property by falsely reporting to the Indian Department that his high-handed measures were demanded by the Indians and required to keep them in a state of quietude, when the facts were that the conduct referred to was against the protest of large numbers of them and impressed the mass of the tribe with a deep sense of his total disregard of right and justice in dealing either with Indians or their white neighbors and friends.

All the matters enumerated and many others, but especially the fact that the pledges by Monteith to the Indians, who had heretofore removed to the reservation, had never been fulfilled, and his religious intolerance, placed a barrier to inducing the non-treaties to occupy the reservation while Monteith remained in charge as agent. For many years after the making of the Nez Percé treaty of 1863 an agent was in charge, James O'Neill, who was universally esteemed and respected by the Nez Percés both on and off the reservation. He was an old pioneer, who understood their character, had their confidence, and labored for peace and harmony, fulfilled his pledges, and by his firmness made his authority respected. I make these remarks relative to Mr. O'Neill, the former agent, that affidavits of John J. Manuel and C. B. Wood, regarding the situation of affairs at the commencement of the Nez Percé hostilities, may be correctly understood. I read from copies of affidavits the originals of which I have filed in the Interior Department:

TERRITORY OF IDAHO,
County of Idaho, ss:

I, Charles B. Wood, after being duly sworn, depose and say that about the 1st of last June the following-named Indians: Chotely Mox-Mox, Red Elk, Sharpsus, Ilkip, and Caps-Caps, came to me and told me they had been sent by White Bird to ask me if I could not do something for them. I asked them what it was they wished. They said that Joseph had agreed to go on the reservation, and they supposed they would have to go too. They said they would be willing to go if there was a good agent like Mr. O'Neill at the agency; but while Monteith was there the only way Howard could get them there would be to pack them. They wished me to write them a paper and see if General Howard would not put another agent there; and I told them it would be of no use for me to do it if I wished, for I did not know General Howard, and if I did I did not think he could remove the agent if he was so disposed. Then they told me if the soldiers came after them while Monteith was there that they would fight before they would go.

B. F. MORRIS,
Auditor and Recorder, Idaho County, Idaho Territory,
By N. GOULD, Deputy.

TERRITORY OF IDAHO,
County of Idaho, ss:

John J. Manuel, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is now temporarily residing at Mount Idaho, in said county, in consequence of wounds received at White Bird Creek, in said county, where he had resided for about three and one-half years previously, and had resided in said county since the spring of the year 1862. That he is well acquainted with White Bird, Black-Tail Eagle, Chotely Mox-Mox, and Captain John, the most prominent chiefs residing on Salmon River, and is acquainted with nearly all the Nez Percé Indians, who have been residing on Salmon River, within said county, who united in the hostilities commenced on the 13th of June last. That he has frequently heard Black Tail Eagle, Chotely Mox-Mox, and Captain John, chiefs above named, and many of the Indians, say that they would be willing to go on the Nez Percé reservation if there was another agent there, often stating that all they wanted was such a man as James O'Neill, formerly agent; and they often further stated that they would never go on the reservation while Monteith was there as agent, but would fight first; and deponent further says that he believes that had there been another agent in charge of the Nez Percé agency the recent hostilities would not have occurred.

JOHN J. MANUEL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this September 3, 1877.

B. F. MORRIS,
Auditor and Recorder, Idaho County, Idaho Territory.

I have been acquainted with both of the affiants for nearly sixteen years and vouch for their credibility and say that the statements made by them can be corroborated by the mass of settlers who were familiar with the hostile Indians before the outbreak. Just prior to Mr. Wood's having been called upon by the Indians sent by White Bird, now with Sitting Bull, and who was always the master-spirit of the hostile Nez Percés, there had been a council held at Lapwai at which General Howard was present, at which time thirty days was fixed as the limit of time allowed to the non-treaties to remove upon the reservation.

Information was sent time and time again by the settlers to both the military authorities at Fort Lapwai and to the agent that an outbreak was imminent and hourly expected; but so little regard had the agent for the lives and property of the white citizens, or so limited was his knowledge of the character of the Indians under his charge, and so slight his appreciation of the legitimate results of his own vicious administration, that while it was notorious to the country that the disaffected Indians were holding councils and performing their military exercises daily within a short distance of the reservation, and making every arrangement for the conflict, and within twenty days of the outbreak, he, J. B. Monteith, by letter, authorized the selling of ammunition to the Indians to enable them more effectually to carry out their hellish designs.

While the Indians remain under the control of the Interior Department, with the power in their hands to direct and control action and call to their assistance the military authorities to enforce their edicts, your peace policy advocates will not tolerate a movement by the Army or the officers thereof relative to the Indians, except upon their recommendation, or until hostilities have actually commenced. This is strikingly illustrated in the inauguration of the Nez Percé war. After the murder or mortal wounding of twenty settlers, and over three weeks from the commencement of the military exercises and preparations above referred to, and at the time of the disastrous battle of White Bird Creek there were but seventy hostile Nez Percés embarked in the conflict. Had not the military been restrained under the present divided and inefficient system, the first note of danger and preparation would have been responded to, and by a simple show of force the whole Nez Percé war and its train of evils been averted by checking in the bud the hostile movement before it assumed force.

This divided authority is always a source of weakness and inefficiency. The agent under the present system is never ready to admit that he has been a failure and that real danger exists until the blow is struck with its harvest of death and devastation. Transfer the control of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. You will then have no divided responsibility. There will be no delays in taking necessary steps to restrain anticipated outbreaks, and a feeling of comparative security will at once be inaugurated on the frontiers.

The interests of humanity, economy, efficient public service, permanent advancement of the Indians in civilization, and an early disposition of the whole vexed Indian question by rendering them self-sustaining, demands the passage of the bill under consideration.

On motion of Mr. FENN, (at ten o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BISBEE: The petition of L. A. Hardee and other citizens of Florida, for an appropriation for experiments in dissipating pestilent air by concussions caused by the explosion of gunpowder, by which it is claimed localities affected with ravages of epidemics can be rendered perfectly healthy—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CABELL: Papers relating to the war claim of William A. Wellford—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CALKINS: Eleven petitions of citizens of Hebron, North Judson, Winamac, Remington, Kentland, Crown Point, Reynolds, Monticello, Goodland, Walcott, and Seafield, Indiana, for the passage of the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of citizens of Hemlock, Pennsylvania, of similar importance—to the same committee.

By Mr. COX, of New York: The petition of H. Lorillard and other soldiers, for the printing of the data of the battle of Gettysburgh, as recommended by the Secretary of War—to the Committee of Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Augustus Kehrwieder, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FORNEY: The petition of citizens of Blount County, Alabama, for the passage of the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill, provided the road is built from Vicksburgh to San Diego on the thirty-second parallel—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. GOODE: The petition of Letitia Tyler Semple, for compensation for property destroyed during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, memorial of sugar merchants of Norfolk, Virginia, that the duty on sugar be made so much per pound, without regard to color or quality—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. KIDDER: Papers relating to the claim of J. Carlsen, for compensation for services rendered the Khédive of Egypt—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. McCOOK: The petition of Colonel T. B. Hamilton, late of the Sixty-second New York Volunteers, and others, that the data of the battle of Gettysburgh be compiled and published in text form, as recommended by the Secretary of War—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McMAHON: The petition of Auguste Franke, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of citizens of Elyria, Ohio, that aid be given to the proposed polar expedition of Captain Howgate—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: The petition of A. O. McCreery, postmaster at Wetmore, Kansas, against reducing the salaries of postmasters of the fourth class—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. RICE, of Ohio: Papers relating to the pension claim of Rebecca Broughler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCHLEICHER: The petition of citizens of Western Texas, for the deepening of Aransas Pass—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of Samuel H. Franers & Sons, Geo. H. Edyard & Son, John O. Neill, and 41 others, of Baltimore, Maryland, for the erection of a steam fog-whistle upon Cape Henry, at the entrance to Chesapeake Bay—to the same committee.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of the trustees of the Presbyterian church, at Loudon, Tennessee, and of citizens of said town, for compensation for rent, use, and occupation of the building of said church by United States soldiers—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WADDELL: Memorial of Boston merchants and others, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3580) for paying fair compensation per mile for carrying the United States mail in vessels between the United States and Brazil—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of Mrs. Nancy M. Richmond, for a pension—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 3, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PAGE. I am requested to ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. LUTTRELL] who is confined to his bed by sickness.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back with a favorable recommendation the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report and accompanying map of the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River, to accompany House bill No. 4318, with amendments, be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The expense of printing this map will be only forty or fifty dollars.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF TARIFF DUTIES.

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of workingmen and workingwomen of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, assembled in mass-meeting at Chester, against a reduction of tariff duties.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, we have a rule which authorizes any member to deposit in a box petitions and memorials which are sent to him. Now these machine-made memorials and petitions, being got up for effect, ought to go in the box, like all other papers of the kind, under the rule. I object to their being presented in open House. They are gotten up by contract, and amount to nothing as an expression of public opinion.

Mr. WARD. This is not a "machine-made" petition; this is bona fide and honest.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the presentation of the petition.

Mr. WARD. The reference of the gentleman from New York is unwarranted, and would come from no other source.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no power in the matter.

Mr. WARD. I am aware of that.

ORVILLE LOVEING.

Mr. SAMPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4677) granting a pension to Orville Loveing; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT COLES.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for action now the bill (S. No. 312) for the relief of Robert Coles. A House bill almost identical with this has been before the Committee on Public Lands of this House, who have reported it back with a unanimous recommendation that it be passed.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDEN. I reserve a point of order on this bill until I have asked a question of the gentleman who desires to bring it up.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. EDEN. If I understand this bill from the reading, it proposes to give Lucas County, Iowa, the right to locate some indemnity certificates for swamp lands that have been sold.

Mr. MILLS. Does this bill make an appropriation of land or money? If so, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it makes an appropriation of land. The request is now to take it from the Speaker's table for consideration.

Mr. SAPP. I would like to make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will allow a word of explanation, I think he will not make his point of order. My colleague, [Mr. SAPP,] a member of the Committee on Public Lands, will make a statement if the gentleman from Texas will give his attention.

Mr. SAPP. I would like to state, for the information of the gentleman from Texas, that a House bill almost identical with this was carefully considered by the Committee on Public Lands of this House. Every statement, every allegation in this bill was ascertained by absolute proof to be true beyond all controversy, and if the statement of fact recited in the bill entitles the party to relief there is no doubt it ought to be granted to him. The bill has been thoroughly investigated and unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLS. This bill is being taken out of its regular order, and bills upon the Private Calendar are deferred by making an exception in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. At the suggestion of the gentleman, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. MORRISON. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order and the bill remains upon the Speaker's table.

TRANSPORTATION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. CUTLER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2206, a bill (H. R. No. 4678) relative to the transportation of animals; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, with the accompanying report, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

THOMAS A. WESTON.

Mr. VANCE. I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time the bill (S. No. 148) to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to the consideration of that bill or anything that interferes with the regular order.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I demand the regular order of business.

ADVERTISING MAIL-LETTINGS.

The SPEAKER. The Senate have returned the bill (H. R. No. 3967) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings, with a message insisting upon its amendments and asking for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of the conference committee on the part of the House Mr. SINGLETON, Mr. EICKHOFF, and Mr. BALLOU.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. EDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and will resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the paragraph in relation to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. EAMES. We have not yet passed the paragraphs in reference to the Post-Office Department, and I have an amendment to offer before the Clerk reads further.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose it had passed from the consideration of the paragraph in reference to the Post-Office Department, as they had been entirely read through.

Mr. EAMES. Because the paragraph was read does not deprive me of the right to offer an amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the next paragraph was commenced.

Mr. EAMES. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and began the reading of the paragraph in relation to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ATKINS moved that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EAMES. I made the inquiry of the Clerk at the desk in relation to this matter, and he said we had not passed from the paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments had all been disposed of and the Clerk had begun the reading of the next paragraph.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman will allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot consent to go back; I cannot consent to reopen that question.

Mr. EAMES. Will the gentleman allow my proposition to be read?

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot consent to go back.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Chairman, is there any way by which as a member I can reach the opportunity of offering this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know any way by which the gentleman can go back after a paragraph has been passed, unless by unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. EAMES. I was not aware the next paragraph had been read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. ATKINS. If I were to yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island I would be compelled to yield to every other application and we would never get through with the bill.

Mr. EAMES. Let my amendment be read.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the use of having the amendment read if we are not to act upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

For compensation of the Commissioner of Agriculture, $3,000; chief clerk, $1,900; entomologist, $1,900; chemist, $1,900; assistant chemist, $1,400; superintendent of experimental gardens and grounds, $1,900; statistician, $1,900; disbursing clerk, $1,600; superintendent of seed room, $1,600; librarian, $1,200; botanist, $1,800; microscopist, $1,800; engineer, $1,200; and for clerks, copyists, laborers, watchmen, carpenters, attendants in museum, and other necessary force, $42,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary; in all, $65,600; and in addition to the proper vouchers and accounts therefor to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall present a detailed statement of the manner of the expenditure of this sum, to accompany his estimates to be presented at the next regular session of Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. I move, in line 1773, after the word "force," to insert "including two clerks of class 2, who shall be practical printers." That does not increase the force at all.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to offer some amendments to this paragraph. I will state what the amendments are as it may be they are open to the point of order. I wish the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations while I state them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendments up to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the amendments as follows:

In line 1759, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,500;" in line 1759, strike out "$1,900" and insert "$2,250;" in line 1761 strike out "$1,900" and insert "$2,400;" in line 1764 strike out "$1,900" and insert "$2,500;" in line 1769 strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000."

Mr. ATKINS. I think that all those amendments are subject to the point of order, except perhaps one. It may be that all of them are subject to the point of order. I raise the question of order upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon what ground?

Mr. ATKINS. Upon the ground that they increase the salaries over and above what are provided by law.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to waive the point of order with reference to this amendment. Let it be submitted to discussion.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot waive the point of order.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. It seems to me very unjust under the circumstances that this Department should be subjected to this objection.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no Department I have more sympathy with than the Agricultural Department; but I must raise the point of order.

Mr. CUTLER. The point of order raised by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to these several propositions was sustained yesterday by the Chair on another amendment, and upon an appeal being taken the decision of the Chair was sustained by the House. Therefore I am not disposed to enter upon a discussion of the point of order upon the amendment as I have now presented it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is entirely satisfied as to a part of this amendment that the point of order will lie. The Chair has not examined the whole of it.

Mr. CUTLER. If the point of order is insisted on by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and is sustained by the decision of the Chair, then I have other amendments to offer to the same paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Taking the amendment as a whole the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CUTLER. I now send up to the desk an amendment to which I think the point of order will not apply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 1759 and 1760 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1760 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1761 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1762 by striking out "$1,400" and inserting "$1,600." Amend line 1764 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000;" so that it will read: "chief clerk, $2,000; entomologist, $2,000; chemist, $2,000; assistant chemist, $1,600; superintendent of experimental gardens and grounds, $2,000."

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order on that amendment. We have followed in this bill the salaries fixed by the last law, which I consider was a repeal of the former law.

Mr. CUTLER. Before the point of order is decided I send to the desk another amendment to the same paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 1764 and 1765 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1768 by striking out "$1,200" and inserting "$1,800;" so that it will read: "statistician, $2,000; disbursing clerk, $1,600; superintendent of seed-room, $1,600; librarian, $1,800."

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order on that amendment also.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would request the gentleman from New Jersey to refer to the statutes upon which he relies.

Mr. CUTLER. The Chair will observe I have withdrawn the amendment increasing the salary of the Commissioner, and now propose to amend only those portions of the section which fix the salaries of the other officers named in the amendment. I only regret that under the law I am unable to ask an increase so as to increase the salaries of the chemist and entomologist to $3,000. It is only because I know that that amendment would be subject to the point of order I have not presented it. For, if in any Department of the Government there is any position in which the Government should have the very best talent to be had in the country, we should have it in the chemical and the entomological branches of the Agricultural Department, as well as in the botanical branch.

As the point of order has been raised as regards the increase of compensation to the Commissioner of Agriculture, I have withdrawn that, because, under the act of 1862 creating the Department of Agriculture, the salary of the Commissioner was fixed at $3,000 and the salaries of the chief clerk, the chemist, and the assistant chemist were fixed at the sums named in the amendment which I have presented. Under the act of 1873, which repealed the act fixing these salaries, the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture was raised to $4,000. By the act of 1874, which repealed the act of 1873, the act increasing the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture was repealed; but no part of that act repealed the act fixing the salary as provided in the law of 1862.

Now, while it is true that the appropriation act of last year fixes these salaries at $1,900, I beg to remind the Chair that that act is only applicable to the existing fiscal year and that the law expires by its own limitation on the 1st day of July, while the general law unrepealed fixes the salaries of these respective officers at $2,000; so that at the expiration of the appropriation act of 1877, expiring on the 1st day of July, 1878, the law fixing these salaries ceases and we go back to the original law of 1862. Therefore I think the question of order is not applicable to the salaries of the officers named in these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey, in order to save trouble in looking it up, if the amounts fixed in his amendment correspond to the salaries provided in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CUTLER. Yes, sir; exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair will ask the gentleman further if any of those salaries except the salary of the Commissioner is interfered with by the repealing act of June 30, 1874?

Mr. CUTLER. No, sir; only the salary of the Commissioner is interfered with.

The CHAIRMAN. And the salary of the Commissioner is not embraced in this amendment?

Mr. CUTLER. It is not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have only examined the question as to the chief clerk. By the general law his salary is fixed at $2,000. By what is known as the act increasing the compensation of officers of the Government—I will not mention it by its popular name—the salary of the clerk was not increased. That act, the act of March 3, 1873, increased the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture and there stopped.

By the act of 1874, which repealed the act of 1873, only so much of course was repealed as had been enacted by the act of 1873. The act of 1873 not having referred to the clerks in the Agricultural Department, the repealing act of 1874 did not in any respect change the general law, which had been in force for many years.

If the Chair should be inclined to decide any of these amendments not in order, I would call his special attention to the Revised Statutes, which says that "there shall be in the Department of Agriculture one chief clerk at a salary of $2,000 a year."

The CHAIRMAN. To what statute does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. To section 521 of the Revised Statutes, bringing down the old law of many years' standing. This amendment only proposes to restore the salaries of the officers to the rates established by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the other portions of the amendment correspond with the salaries as fixed in the Revised Statutes?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not recollect as to all of the amendments.

Mr. CUTLER. I will inform the Chair they are the same.

The CHAIRMAN. That is satisfactory on that point.

Mr. ATKINS. I have this to say, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order; I believe that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. CUTLER] concedes that the proposition to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture is subject to the point of order which I raised.

The CHAIRMAN. That is conceded.

Mr. ATKINS. With regard to the others, I have only this much to say: the appropriation act of last year reduced the salaries of all these clerks and employés to which the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CUTLER] relates, and this bill corresponds to that act. Now, I do not say that the appropriation act of last year repealed the other law; I do not say that; still it seems to me it is by no means a clear proposition that it did not repeal it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let me read the enacting clause of the last appropriation act:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, for the objects hereinafter expressed.

That act was for that year alone. It might have fixed the salary of these officers at $500 a year; still it would not have changed the general law authorizing them to receive a salary of $2,000 a year, for there is no repealing clause.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman contend that these officers would have a right to a deficiency under the previous law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is a question it is not necessary to raise now. I say that the law may fix the salary at $10,000 a year, and the House, if they think proper, may choose to appropriate only $500 or $5,000; but unless the law is repealed it stands in full force for another year.

Mr. ATKINS. At all events there has been an interregnum in the law. The appropriation act for the last session of Congress made an interregnum in the law, so far as that is concerned, and I am of opinion that that constitutes law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir; a statute cannot be repealed by interregnum.

Mr. ATKINS. And, besides, the two being inconsistent with each other, as a matter of course the last law should stand as the judgment of Congress.

Mr. MILLS. There are two questions which may arise under an appropriation bill. One may be the amount of money required to carry out the previous law; the other may be that the appropriation bill goes further and legislates. In the first instance, where it is simply an appropriation in compliance with pre-existing law, the bill expires when it has executed its function for the current fiscal year. In the second instance the provision is a continuing power and becomes the law of the land, just as was the preceding law, and it changes the preceding law. Now, it was competent for the appropriation act to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] referred the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] to have gone on after making the appropriation for the current fiscal year and provided that the salary of Commissioner of Agriculture or of the chief clerk should only be $1,600, $1,700, or $1,800. If it had done that and had made a continuing law, that would have been one thing; but as the bill only appropriated a certain sum of money out of the Treasury to comply in whole or in part with the pre-existing law, then the appropriation act expired with the year. The fact that Congress at the last session did not choose to appropriate the full amount required by law to pay an officer, is no reason for saying that the law fixing his compensation has been abrogated.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] I will say that there is no shadow of doubt in the mind of any lawyer in this House that where a salary has been fixed by law for a certain officer, and Congress does not make an appropriation sufficiently large to pay that salary, that officer is still legally entitled to the full amount of his salary. It is a question of the sovereign power in the legislative body whether they will pay that salary or not. The officer cannot sue the Government for it; but if the Government were a subject instead of a sovereign, the officer could go into the courts and compel compliance with the law fixing his salary. It is only because the Government shields itself behind its sovereignty that the officer cannot do so. But the law is the same; he is entitled to his salary legally just the same as if the appropriation had been made for the full amount.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to say one word on this point of order. As I understand it, there are but two laws referred to which are supposed to govern this case; one is the provision of the Revised Statutes which declares that this officer shall receive the salary which is mentioned and provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER,] the other is the enactment of last year; and the question here, as I understand it, is entirely whether the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CUTLER] is new legislation in defiance of the legislation of last year, whether it changes an existing law of last year.

Now, sir, I undertake to say this: that we are in this bill and upon this subject legislating for a period to which the law of last year does not apply.

There is no law coming over from last year that reaches the period beyond the 30th of June next. The law of last year after that date is tabula rasa, and therefore we are utterly without law upon this subject, unless it be the law of the Revised Statutes, which controls the matter.

I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if, under the law of last year, the Commissioner of Agriculture could employ any clerks and charge the expense to the Government, except as the result of new legislation. The law of last year will expire, as I have said, upon the 30th of June next, and then there is no law arising from the legislation of last year, and we are now at liberty to give such compensation for clerks after the 30th of June next, so far as the law last year is concerned, as we choose, subject only to the limitations of the provisions of the Revised Statutes, and we have the power not to employ any clerks at all. The Commissioner of Agriculture cannot employ a clerk without new legislation after the 30th of June, and therefore there is no change in the law in the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. To illustrate that the law of the Revised Statutes governs and controls this legislation I have but to make this statement: suppose the appropriation bill, instead of enumerating the clerks and the amount to be paid to each person, should appropriate a sum in gross, to be disbursed according to law, would not the disbursing officer turn to the law? Would he be governed by the amount allowed to this clerk or the other, this year or last year? It is very evident that any man of sense would turn to the general law of the country, which stands unrepealed on the statute-book, and not to a law which operates only for one year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requests the attention of the committee to Rule 120, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. ATKINS. I waive the point of order as to all except the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. CUTLER. That is not now in the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I waive the point of order, but I do not admit the propriety of the increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is now open for debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I want to beg of this Congress to remember that all of the legislation of the country in favor directly of the agricultural interests is mean and parsimonious as compared with the interests at stake, and I want to commend that fact especially to those who come from the portions of the country where the agricultural interests are paramount. We raise millions and hundreds of millions of money with a view to promote the commercial interests, and when it comes to an interest that spreads all over the soil of the largest empire on the globe we scarcely spend money enough to furnish pocket-money for our Commissioner of Agriculture, if he should use the whole of it. I hope the time will come when we shall foster our agricultural interests by more liberal legislation than any that has been dreamed of up to the present time.

The Committee on Agriculture recommends that the Bureau of Agriculture be made one of the Executive Departments of this country. I have not made up my mind whether that is right or wrong, but I have made up my mind that there should be no baggling when an appropriation is asked for the great agricultural interest which gives us this year a balance of $250,000,000 of exports over imports. I hope our legislation will have some little reference to the magnitude of the interest at stake.

Mr. ATKINS. I think that the salaries provided in this bill are sufficient for these officers. There is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to do any injustice to the Agricultural Department. There is no injustice done to the Agricultural Department by this little reduction which we have made in the salaries of these different officers, clerks, and employés. What harm does it do to the great system of agriculture?

Now, I do not care to say anything about the bureau in Washington except that the Bureau of Agriculture of this district is no representative of that great interest in this country.

Mr. HAYES. Simply because you have crippled it.

Mr. ATKINS. You cannot magnify it sufficiently to make it a representative of that great interest in this country. It is the great interest of the country. It is the foundation-stone upon which the whole fabric is built. We all know that, we all feel it.

Now, sir, when we come to look into the practical operations of this bureau and its intercourse with the great interests it pretends to represent it is a mere bagatelle. You make an appropriation for seeds to be distributed by this Agricultural Bureau throughout the country, and one man in a hundred gets those seeds. [A voice: "One in a thousand."] Yes, I might say one in a thousand; and the other nine hundred and ninety-nine are taxed to give seeds to one man. Yet I do not make any assault upon the Agricultural Bureau on this account. I am only illustrating the idea I have already advanced that this bureau, if it pretends to be the representative of the great agricultural interest, falls very far short of it.

Now, what harm can be done to the agricultural interests of this country by giving the chief clerk of this Department a salary of $1,900 instead of $2,000? Will the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture tell me what harm is done to the great agricultural interests—the cotton-growing interest, the cereal interest, the tobacco interest, the grass interest, or any other agricultural interest of this country—because you cut down the salary of one man to the extent of $100?

We have only conformed these reductions to others we have made in this bill; and I tell the gentleman that the people of this country, the agricultural interest of the country, will sympathize with any efforts made in this bill to run the Agricultural Bureau upon as economical a scale as possible. I say the reductions made in these salaries are only in conformity and in unison with the other salaries throughout the whole bill, and are perfectly in accord with the last appropriation act and the one preceding.

Now, tell me, have any of these gentlemen resigned? They have been serving on these salaries for the last two years. Has a single one of them resigned? Do we hear any threats to that effect? No, sir, we have heard nothing of the kind; and even if there were any probability of such a result, I can assure gentlemen who are so anxious to have these salaries put up, that we can find plenty of men who are quite as competent as the present incumbents, to step up and take these places.

Sir, the Appropriations Committee in preparing this bill have not been actuated by any opposition to the agricultural interest. I was born upon a farm; I have lived upon one almost all my life; my entire sympathies and interests are identified with the agriculture of this country. I have no means of support except agriculture—none whatever except so far as the position I now hold may be a means of support; and that is but temporary.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do not feel any particular interest in the precise amount of salary which may be paid to the incumbents of this bureau from the Commissioner down. But I differ with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when he says that the Agricultural Bureau is not a representative of the great agricultural interests of this country; and I differ with him especially in the reasons upon which he comes to that conclusion. He says that because seed cannot be distributed to every man in the country or only to one man in a thousand, therefore this bureau ceases to be the representative of the great agricultural interests of the country. Sir, I regard the distribution of seed, especially when purchased and not raised by the Agricultural Department, as unsatisfactory in its results. But so far from cutting down the appropriations for the support of this great bureau, they ought to be increased; and it ought to stand as the representative of that primal interest which is the first great calling of the whole human race. It is not in the distribution of seeds to this or that person that the Agricultural Bureau represents the agricultural interest of the country; it is because in its annual and in its monthly reports it furnishes to the country the best and most reliable statistics of the productions of the country.

You dedicate millions to protect commerce; you appropriate millions to facilitate transportation; yet if the Great Master of the Universe should curse with sterility for a single season the bosom of our common mother all your great commerce would perish and your great lines of railway would have nothing to transport.

Sir, when the great agricultural interest of the country is mentioned and it is proposed to expend money in its encouragement, I am tired of hearing of economy with reference to fostering this great industrial pursuit of the human race; for not only do you maintain life upon the products of the earth as they are annually made, but those products bear the great burden of taxation, Federal, State, county, and municipal, which the people of the country pay.

In dealing with this great interest, so far from cutting down you ought to sustain it and nurture it and encourage it. You ought to have acre after acre of the soil of Maryland and Virginia contiguous to your capital in a state of cultivation under the supervision of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and you should there raise seeds to be distributed to the country and let the reports concerning the results come back again to the Department.

Why, sir, I was very much struck not long since in reading one of these reports in which the Commissioner of Agriculture said that he had been accused by the commercial interest of telling what was not the truth with reference to the great product of my own region of country—cotton. The correctness of his vaticinations as to the effect with regard to the crops was made manifest, and I assert here to-day that with reference to this great product of the South the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture have commanded more attention from the southern people than any other document from any other quarter or Department of the Government, and have been the means of diffusing more useful knowledge than any other.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one word in regard to the distribution of seeds. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or any other gentleman in this House can devise a more efficient means and a more equitable means and mode of distributing seeds from the Agricultural Bureau than that now adopted, they shall have my earnest aid in carrying out any proposition they will bring forward for the accomplishment of that object. But let us not forget that immense amounts of benefit have been already done the country by the present mode of distributing seeds. Among the seeds distributed from the Agricultural Bureau in the years past are seed oats. They have been sent to the Northwest. I saw last summer a field of forty acres of oats which had been gathered and in shocks and was being stacked, the seed of which three years before had come from the Agricultural Bureau, and that field of oats had produced one hundred bushels to the acre. And I may say without the fear of contradiction that the improvement in the oats in the Northwest in the last five years has been more than sufficient to pay all the expense of the Agricultural Bureau for the last five years. The gentleman standing near me, who represents Kansas, tells me that in the article called Foltz wheat they received a single package, one gentleman in his State a few years ago, and now that form of wheat supplies the entire product of the State for some five or six adjacent counties and is the best article they have ever had to sow and reap in that most fertile and beautiful State.

And you will find this is true all over the country. It is not every package of seed that carries a thousand dollars with it; but if one package of seed sent to one State shall be the means of increasing the productions of that State by fifty or a hundred thousand a year, we can well afford to persevere in the good work of casting our bread upon the waters that we may gather it again after many days.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. The question before the committee is not one of whether or not the agricultural interest has been neglected—whether large sums of money have been expended in the interest of commerce and of manufactures while the agricultural interest has been neglected; not at all, sir; but it is simply a question as to the compensation of certain officials in the Agricultural Department; that and nothing more. When we were in the high tide of prosperity these salaries were fixed by the act of 1873 at the rates designated in the Revised Statutes which have been cited by the gentleman from New Jersey. The statute of 1873 is the last one on the subject fixing these salaries. They have remained at those rates from that time up to and during the last Congress. But what was done then? We found the country in distress. We proclaimed as a party that we intended to relieve the burdens of the country. We came to the offices in all the Departments of the Government and we commenced what our enemies have deemed fit to designate as the "paring process." Upon an army of about eighty-seven thousand men getting salaries by the process of the 10 per cent. reduction, we would under that "paring process" have reduced over eight and a half million dollars. It was nothing like the reduction in labor and every other item on the part of the people; it was nothing like it. When we came to the chief clerk in this Department, by reason of the efficiency of the then occupant of that position, his salary was not reduced over 2½ per cent. This bill is but $50 below the salary we found the chief clerk receiving when the Forty-fourth Congress came into existence

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not now. Do we intend to be true to what we did in the Forty-fourth Congress? Was the course we then pursued the right and proper course? Can we only be kept from defeat in our policy of retrenchment and economy because some point of order can be made? Is the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] true that this is the most extravagant House of Representatives which has met for years?

This is all there is in it. It is a question whether or not these salaries are to stand as they have stood for years under the legislation of the Forty-fourth Congress. It is this and nothing more. Gentlemen may magnify it and talk about the mean course pursued toward agriculture. Now, sir, the distribution of seeds throughout the country will not cease because some man's salary in the Department of Agriculture is not advanced above that of other officers. The various kinds of seeds will continue to go throughout the land as heretofore.

My friend from Virginia says you increase commerce, you increase the modes of transportation, and you neglect the interest of agriculture. That is not the case presented here at all. It is a simple question of raising the salaries of these officers. The chief clerk of the Department of Agriculture during the last administration was an efficient man, and by reason of that fact his salary was allowed to remain, or rather was not reduced in as great a proportion as the salaries of other officers.

He takes a subordinate position and the Government still has his service. No, sir; there is no excuse on earth for the increase of these salaries and I do hope that this House will find some other restraining motive than simply a point of order to hold it to that principle of economy which has had to be carried out all through this land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MULDROW. I should not have taken part in this discussion if it were not that I am satisfied the interests of this Department have been greatly neglected. In my judgment there is no Department in this Government that deserves so much the fostering care of the Government as the Department of Agriculture. And yet the fact is that the appropriations heretofore made for this Department have been doled out with such a parsimonious hand as to make it comparatively valueless. That it can be made profitable, that it can be made a Department of great importance to the Government, to my mind there is no question. But the difficulty has been to have accorded to it substantial justice. There has been no difficulty at any time in extracting from members on this floor words of adulation for the Department, but the difficulty has been to have accorded to it substantial acts of justice.

Large appropriations have been made for other Departments of the Government. Yet we find that heretofore the appropriations for this Department have been insignificantly small, and they are becoming smaller year by year. In 1868 the appropriation was about $208,000. This year the Committee on Appropriations propose to cut it down to $167,000 or $168,000.

This parsimonious treatment of this Department has excited attention everywhere throughout the agricultural districts of this country. There is not a member of Congress, I presume, from the agricultural districts who has not received numerous letters on that subject calling attention to the fact that this Department is not receiving the aid and encouragment it ought to receive at the hands of Congress. I have risen simply to say this, not so much with reference to the particular amendment now pending, but generally to urge that there should be more liberality shown toward this Department of the Government than has been shown heretofore by the American Congress.

I say aid and encourage this Department, and show by your acts that you mean what you say when you say you are in favor of encouraging the agricultural interests of the country. The distribution of seeds has proved of great value. The farmers take more interest in this than in any other Department of the Government. Whatever members of Congress may say to belittle this important Department, the people recognize it as their friend. And so far as I have heard an expression of opinion from the agricultural regions they are the friends of the Department and desire to see it upheld, sustained, and encouraged by every legitimate means in the power of Congress.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment, and I do so for the purpose of saying that the Agricultural Department is an important one. It is possible that mistakes may have been made in its administration arising from errors of judgment on the part of the Commissioner, or from the want of sufficiently liberal appropriations, but it is well to recollect that the very object of its establishment is twofold, one to collect and disseminate agricultural statistics and the other to conduct systematic experiments; and while I have no doubt the Department has made some failures, it has often succeeded. The reports of the Commissioner are generally sought after and found to be valuable. I am therefore in favor of liberal appropriations for this Department, and this too for the benefit of the whole country, for the agricultural interest cannot be benefited without every other interest reaping a part of the reward, for all interests of the country are closely banded together. My own State of Illinois is generally classed as purely an agricultural State, yet, as I now recollect, the census report of 1870 shows that while the agricultural products of that State for that year were of the value of $210,000,000, the manufactured products were of the value of $205,000,000. These statements may not be strictly reliable, yet they serve to show that the manufactured products are very large as well as the agricultural products.

Mr. Chairman, the amount proposed to be appropriated for this Department is in round numbers $200,000, a mere bagatelle in comparison with the total appropriations for the other Departments of the Government, which will amount in round numbers to say $140,000,000; so I do not see why gentlemen should unwillingly make the appropriation. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in conclusion that I represent a district that is probably second to none in agriculture in the United States, and during my five years' service here I have not asked as their representative an appropriation for a public building or any other special local interest; yet my constituents and the people of the country are willing to pay the appropriations for all legitimate objects, the Army, the Navy, the Post-Office, and other Departments, that are necessary and must be paid for. More than this, the great waterways of the country should be improved, and we cheerfully help pay all necessary appropriations therefor. It strikes me, however, as a little strange for some gentlemen to oppose this appropriation when it is recollected that a committee of the House reported and the House passed two weeks ago a river and harbor bill appropriating over $7,000,000 when it is notorious that nearly one-half of that amount is for the improvement and rendering navigable of streams that may do for trout, but which the Almighty in His infinite wisdom never contemplated would answer for navigation. I sometimes am amazed at these appropriations, and I fail to see how the constituents of many members justify their action in procuring appropriations for many of these little streams to attempt to render them navigable. Sir, I have in my district the Vermilion, the Embarras, the Okaw, and the Sangamon, streams larger and more important than many mentioned in the river and harbor bill; yet I have a constituency that would not indorse me if I procured an appropriation from Congress to make these streams navigable, for it is not practicable so to do; yet gentlemen who were swift to vote for this river and harbor bill are now seeking to cut down the appropriations, small in amount, for a Department or bureau connected with the greatest interest in the country.

Mr. STEELE. The question as announced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is whether or not the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations makes an appropriation sufficient for this bureau. Now, I say that when we consider the great magnitude of the agricultural interests of the country it must be apparent to every man who cares for the full development of its great resources that the best talent the country can secure should be put in charge of this Department; and I say that it is utterly impossible to get the kind of men, men of skill and science, who are needed in this Department, for the meager and contemptible sum which the Committee on Appropriations propose.

When you take into consideration the report of the committee on this bill, and find that they give the clerks of certain committees of this House who perform simply clerical duties $2,000 a year and the clerk at the Speaker's desk $1,800 a year, while they propose to give the chemist of the Agricultural Department only $1,900, the enormity of the report is made apparent. The idea that this great Government, founded as it is upon the prosperity of the agricultural interests of the country, shall employ a man as a chemist in the Department which ought to be dignified and made to accord with the interests it represents at a salary of $1,800 or $1,900 is stupendous ridiculousness and folly.

Now I tell the gentleman from Tennessee, not doubting his devotion to the agricultural interest, and knowing that he has a direct and personal interest in its advancement, that he mistakes the great heart of that interest if he does not know that they would not hesitate to have appropriated a just sum for the benefit of that great interest, and I say that this House of Representatives would be unfaithful to that great interest if it failed to make a fair appropriation for this service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. AIKEN. I renew it. I am glad that this little debate has shown that which I had not discovered by reading the Congressional Directory, that there are a great many friends of agriculture here and many good farmers. I do not think it necessary for me or any other man to say a word in defense of agriculture, and therefore the few words I say will be in reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who are members of the Committee on Appropriations.

I am surprised at the idea of economy suggested by the gentleman from Georgia in his speech. That gentleman has told us that, upon an examination of the duties performed by various officers in this Department, this clerk has proved himself so efficient that in a general reduction of 10 per cent. there was a less reduction on his salary.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to state——

Mr. AIKEN. Do not interrupt me unless it comes out of your own time, not mine. The gentleman acknowledged the ability of the clerk. I simply call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that eighteen years ago to-day there was no such thing as an Agricultural Department in the United States, and within the first decade after the establishment of that Department there was a great war, which made it almost a nullity until after the war was over. The legislation of Congress in providing for this clerk was done in the very infancy of the Department, and to-day, in spite of the restrictions of the Committee on Appropriations, that Department has grown to be something valuable to the whole agricultural interest of the country, and I say that it is a common-sense view that whenever a Department, starting in its infancy, needs a clerk at $2,000 the duties of that clerk will increase as time goes on, and you must either give him assistance or a larger salary.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said that it matters nothing to the great interest of agriculture in this country whether these clerks are well paid or not. Sir, it is a matter of vital importance to the interest of agriculture. This very day agriculture all over this Union is suffering because of the fact that there is an insufficiency somewhere, either in the number of employés in the Department or in the amount of compensation they receive.

I would call the attention of gentlemen to one officer who is there to-day in service in that Department, and who has been there ever since it was organized. I mean the gentleman who is called here "superintendent of public grounds," which is a misnomer. Those words would imply that this man was a simple supervisor or general overseer of laborers. Now the requirements of the office demand that this man shall be a man of learning, an expert in chemistry, in mineralogy, and in botany. He must be a pomologist and horticulturist, a man acquainted with the science of agriculture in all its occult bearings.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not desire to cut off debate at all, but I would like to know what the committee think in regard to the time this debate shall continue to run.

Mr. BEEBE. I would remind my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that the whole amount involved in the pending amendments is but $1,300, and we have already spent an hour's time on it. I think that we should now come to a vote.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to have a vote or to continue the debate.

Mr. VANCE. I think ten minutes longer will give satisfaction.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The CHAIRMAN. There are some half a dozen gentlemen who are seeking the floor; and as a matter of course the committee can regulate the debate.

Mr. ATKINS. There are other features of the bill upon which gentlemen can make their speeches.

Mr. CUTLER. Allow me to make a suggestion. The Committee on Agriculture will present certain other amendments, and upon them the debate can be continued. The debate upon the pending proposition might be closed now. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to make this proposition to the committee: that we agree upon a definite time for debate in connection with the whole paragraph. I am willing to say thirty minutes or forty minutes or fifty minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Nobody wants to speak now. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Half a dozen men are trying to get the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] has not charge of this bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

Mr. CALKINS. This is a subject to which the Committee on Agriculture has given a great deal of attention. Although but a small amount is involved in the pending amendment I would suggest that the debate be continued a little time until the members of that committee can present their views.

Mr. ATKINS. Debate can be had on their other proposition. I call for a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. AIKEN. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. CUTLER; and upon a division there were—ayes 96, noes 43.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware. I call for tellers; no quorum has voted.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will not call for tellers. We can have a separate vote in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware. I insist upon the call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, and Mr. CUTLER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 101, noes 37.

No further count being called for, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I shall call for a separate vote in the House. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CUTLER] if he has offered an amendment to make the aggregate correspond with the increase.

Mr. CUTLER. I have not.

Mr. ATKINS. That is very important.

Mr. CUTLER. I ask that the Clerk be directed to make the necessary change.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I move to further amend the paragraph by striking out the following:

And for clerks, copyists, laborers, watchmen, carpenters, attendants in museum, and other necessary force, $42,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

My reason for offering that amendment is that the Committee on Appropriations by this paragraph proposes to place in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture the sum of $42,500 as a sort of contingent fund, which he may expend just as he pleases. They have prescribed the employment of several clerks and fixed their pay. Then by the provision which I have moved to strike out they provide that he may have other clerks, without saying how many; that he may have copyists without saying how many; that he may employ laborers and watchmen, few or many, as he chooses; and he is given $42,500 to use just as he sees proper.

It seems to me that in this provision they propose to confer upon the Commissioner of Agriculture a power that is not conferred upon the head of any other bureau of the Government. No other man under this Government has a right to take $42,500 out of the Treasury and expend it as he chooses, to employ clerks few or many and at such prices as he may think proper. I have moved this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the subject and suggesting the propriety that the number of clerks and other persons to whom this money shall be paid shall be designated, and also the rate of payment of each, rather than to give the Commissioner such a large sum of money to use as he may see proper.

I understand that the Commissioner of Agriculture who is to be intrusted with this sum of $42,500 to use in his discretion is a bonded officer of the Government; but the penal amount of his bond is only $10,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I admit there is great force in the criticism made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.] I do not myself like the principle we have adopted in this bill with reference to this particular appropriation. We have not done the same in regard to any other of the Departments. But, sir, the Committee on Appropriations have this to plead in extenuation of their action: the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, backed as I understand by his entire committee, although the other members of the committee were not present, came before our committee and insisted that this should be done; and the Commissioner himself also came before us insisting that it should be done.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Agriculture and the Commissioner of Agriculture and the entire Bureau of Agriculture desired more changes in this appropriation bill than any other bureau of this Government. They came asking that the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture should be increased to $6,000; they came asking that the salaries of all the officers in that Department should be increased. When we declined to do this, they then asked that the appropriation for clerical force should be made in bulk, stating that it would be economical to do so; that if the appropriation should be made in bulk a less sum would be required for the reason that if we assigned specific salaries to the different clerks and employés as had been done formerly and as is done in the other Departments and bureaus of the Government, inconvenience would result from the fact that during a large part of the summer months a large force would be entirely unoccupied yet at the same time drawing salary, whereas in the winter and spring months an increase of force would be necessary. It was urged that if the appropriation should be made in bulk, an increased force could be employed during the time their services were required; and during the summer months there would be a less force employed, and consequently no clerks on pay at that time.

This is the reason why we have made the appropriation in this form. It is a vicious principle, I will admit. However, I have been assured that in the hands of General Le Duc the appropriation will be faithfully and fairly administered. I do not pretend to say that it will not be. We have provided in the conclusion of the paragraph that he shall make a detailed statement of the manner of expending this sum, to accompany his estimates to be presented at the next regular session of Congress.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to put a question to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] When the Commissioner of Agriculture made application for an increase of his salary, did he not inform the Committee on Appropriations that there could be a reduction in the clerical force of his bureau, and did he not report how that force could be reduced in order to show the committee that by the increase of his salary there would be in reality no increased expense? If he did so, is it not possible that this sum of $42,500, placed in his hands to be used at his discretion, may be used to increase the pay of certain persons connected with the force of his bureau instead of being distributed generally among the clerks of the bureau?

Mr. ATKINS. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] I must confess that such an argument was made by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. BRAGG. Then will not the allowance of this sum of $42,500 appropriated in bulk enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to expend this sum for other purposes than those designed by the committee?

Mr. ATKINS. Well, I hardly think so. However, I do not stand sponsor for the Commissioner of Agriculture by any means. I do not know the gentleman, except by sight; I know nothing of him personally. At the same time I know no charges against this officer. We have provided here that a detailed statement of the expenditure of this money shall be made at the next session of Congress. As to how he will expend it I cannot say. We require a detailed statement from him in addition to the proper vouchers of the officers of the Treasury.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to amend by striking out the last word. In answer to what has fallen from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] in reference to the power with which the Commissioner of Agriculture is intrusted by this bill in the disbursement of this appropriation, I can only say that we do the same thing with regard to every Department of the Government. So far from investing this officer with greater discretion or clothing him with a trust greater than is confided to the heads of other Departments, I say the discretion intrusted to him is very much less. As has been well said by the chairman of the committee, the Commissioner is required in his report to Congress to give a detailed account as to the manner in which he expends his money.

Mr. ATKINS. I beg to say that I am not aware that the sums appropriated for clerical force in other bureaus and Departments of the Government are appropriated in the manner in which this is, if that is what the gentleman means to say.

Mr. HOOKER. I did not mean to say that. I say there is reason for this appropriation being made in this form. The Commissioner of Agriculture is constantly employing clerks temporarily as the necessities of his bureau require. He may employ them for only a week; I have known instances in which he has given employment for a week at a certain rate, say $1.50 a day, or whatever may be the fixed rate. He is required by the necessities of his Department to employ a much larger force at particular periods of the year than at others. For instance, when he is putting up seeds for distribution a largely increased force is required. To a very great extent we must rely upon his discretion; and I am not aware that this discretion has been unwisely exercised by the present incumbent of the office. I do not think that the arguments of the gentleman on my left [Mr. BRAGG] ought to prevail to induce the Committee of the Whole to strike out that portion of the bill which invests the Commissioner of Agriculture with this power. He must necessarily exercise a large discretion with reference to the amount of force which may be required at particular periods of the year.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would remind the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] that the expense of putting up seeds is provided for in another portion of the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not hear the remark of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] but I can say that this officer must be intrusted with this discretion in order to carry on his Department properly. I think, therefore, that the argument submitted is not sound with reference to this particular bureau, which needs to have a more numerous force of clerks at some seasons than at others. The Commissioner must be invested with this discretion. In other Departments of the Government it may be possible to find out exactly and provide for the precise number of employés required. In other Departments you may limit it to a particular number; but in this Department it would be difficult, and I think unwise. I am not aware, I repeat again, that the present incumbent of the office of Commissioner of Agriculture has in any way exceeded his authority or employed more people than was absolutely necessary to carry on the public service.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, I understood the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to admit just now that the Commissioner of Agriculture agreed that if his salary was increased there was no necessity for this force or a large part of it. With that admission, sir, I cannot see how any man can vote for this appropriation.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know but my friend from North Carolina puts that a little too strong. I answered the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] and I answered affirmatively, but I do not think the gentleman from North Carolina exactly represents the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCALES. Has the force been reduced since he made that argument?

Mr. ATKINS. This appropriation is made in bulk, and we do not provide for so many clerks.

Mr. SCALES. I cannot yield all my time.

Mr. ATKINS. I thought that you wanted an answer.

Mr. SCALES. Well, answer my question.

Mr. ATKINS. I will answer, then, in this way: that we have not made any appropriation for a specific number of clerks in this bill, but have made an appropriation in bulk.

Mr. SCALES. Has the force been reduced any since he made that argument?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know whether he has turned off any men or not; I have nothing to do with that. This does not go into effect until the 1st of July next.

Mr. SCALES. I know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SCALES. I do not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand there is no provision in the bill providing for the reduction of the force. The argument of the Commissioner, as I understand it, was that if his salary was raised to $6,000 he could reduce the force. Has that been done? That is the question which addresses itself to this House. I speak to the question before the House. If it has not been done I cannot vote in the dark; I cannot vote for this appropriation at all until the number of the force necessary is specified by those gentlemen who ought to know what it should be.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think the gentleman exactly comprehends the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SCALES. I should like to very much.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood him to admit this, that the Commissioner of Agriculture came before the Committee on Appropriations with certain suggestions in reference to the service in his Department. Among other things he wanted the salaries increased.

Mr. SCALES. And the salaries have been increased.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to correct the gentleman. He wanted his salary increased. The idea he seemed to have was that the committee did not want an increase in the bulk of the appropriation and he said that by giving this sum in bulk he could, notwithstanding the increase of his salary, make the amount appropriated less than heretofore, that the increase of his salary would not result in any increase of the force or appropriation.

Mr. SCALES. I understand that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I so understood the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SCALES. I understood his statement to be that the increase of his salary would justify him in reducing the force.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not his statement. I do not like to take the gentleman's time.

Mr. SCALES. I should like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. ATKINS. I think I can make it plain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has nearly expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I will take the floor and give the gentleman my time.

Mr. SCALES. I should like to have an answer to my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SCALES. If the Committee on Appropriations will let me ask my question, we will get along better.

I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia this question: was the proposition that, if the salary of the Commissioner was increased to $6,000, the bulk of the expenditures of that Department could be reduced?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not understand it in that way.

Mr. SCALES. Was it that it would not cost any more?

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand it to be simply this: he proposed a different plan of paying employés of that bureau; that is to say, there were certain seasons of the year when he could dispense with the services of certain employés. Under the law there were certain annual employés provided for, and that by giving the appropriation in bulk he could employ a portion, say for only six months, and if we should increase his salary by that arrangement there would be no increase in the total appropriation.

Mr. SCALES. Has the committee provided for that state of things in this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. The appropriation is in bulk.

Mr. SCALES. Have you provided for that state of things when he turns off men in the summer?

Mr. BLOUNT. We consider that we have. The gentleman will see that we provide for clerks, copyists, laborers, watchmen, carpenters, attendants in the museum, and other necessary force, $42,500.

Mr. SCALES. I know that; but that was on the condition his salary was to remain at $3,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all. As I understand this increase of salary was recommended to the committee with the idea that the total appropriation would thus be reduced.

Mr. ATKINS. We give the $42,500 asked for by the Commissioner of Agriculture, but we do not give the $6,000. The gentleman from North Carolina is right.

Mr. SCALES. But if you had given the $6,000 the $42,500 would not have been necessary. It seems to me there is only one way of understanding this. If you increase the salary to $6,000 the $3,000 must be provided for somewhere. It must be cut off from the employés or other expenditures or it must be taken out of the Treasury. How are you going to save it? I ask the committee to tell me, have they saved it? If he can get along with $3,000 let him get along with it, but they ought to reduce the $3,000 out of the general amount.

Mr. BRAGG. I withdraw the pro forma amendment. I offer what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "museum," in line 1762, the words, "and other necessary force, $42,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary," and insert as follows: "superintendent of folding-room, $1,200; one attendant in museum, $1,000; one carpenter, $960; two copyists, at $900 each, $1,800; two assistant messengers, at $720 each, $1,440; two watchmen, at $720 each, $1,440; eight laborers, at $720 each, $5,760; in all, $13,600."

Mr. BRAGG. The amount in this amendment which I offer I believe is precisely what is allowed the Agriculture Department at present, is it not? I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe it is, except that it makes no provision for clerks.

Mr. BRAGG. The purpose of this amendment is to make the appropriation for certain specific purposes, to make it in a specific amount, taking away all discretion as to the distribution of money from the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the gentleman is mistaken. His amendment does not give the clerks. The law says:

Three clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; six clerks of class 1; one engineer, at $1,200; superintendent of folding-room, $1,200, &c.

The gentleman has left all that out.

Mr. BRAGG. I have commenced where the list begins in the estimates.

Mr. ATKINS. The bureau would be utterly crippled if the amendment of my friend from Wisconsin should be adopted. If the Committee of the Whole desire to strike out this appropriation in bulk it would be necessary to remodel the whole clerical force of this bureau.

The amendment of the gentleman therefore falls far short of what is necessary. While I admit this is a vicious practice, yet we have been assured by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and by the Commissioner of Agriculture himself that we could get along with a less appropriation in this way, and this is a less appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] has expired.

Mr. CUTLER. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will not prevail. If this amendment prevails the clerical force of that Department, as has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will be completely crippled. I do not see any great objection to adopting the bill as reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It is true the bill places in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture the sum of $42,500 to be expended, but the amount is not necessarily to be expended by him. It is provided that he shall only expend so much thereof as may be necessary; and the bill provides that he shall make a detailed statement showing the exact amount that is paid for salaries or compensation. I think it would be well, Mr. Chairman, for this House for one year to let the Department be run in this way, in order that at the expiration of that year it may be seen just exactly what amount of money and what amount of labor are required by the Department.

We give to other Departments here from $50,000 to $100,000 for contingent expenses and never ask them for an account. You give to certain bureaus $100,000 for contingent expenses, and they never give an account to this Congress or any Department of the Government. And here we place in the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture the sum of $42,500, no more than has been appropriated at the last Congress, no more than has been appropriated in any one of the five last Congresses, and we say to him, "Now run that Department in the most economical way you can, and report back to this Congress exactly how you have expended that money." It should be remembered also that this Commissioner is the only one in all the Departments who gives bonds. There is not any other Commissioner in any other Department of the Government who does so.

Mr. AIKEN. I hope the House will not agree to the amendment. It has been very crudely drawn. Is begins with the text of the bill in line 1772 and leaves the first half of that line where there are officers without number mentioned, and no provision is made for their salaries. But I did not rise to say a word on the amendment.

I wish to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.] Unless I heard him incorrectly he has left a reflection upon the Commissioner of Agriculture who I believe should be vindicated right here. I am not his champion; I know very little of him, but I am satisfied that he is incapable of doing what I understood the gentleman from North Carolina intimated he had done, and that was to say that if the committee would increase his salary 100 per cent. he could reduce the cost of his office to that amount, which of course would involve a reduction of the salaries of his clerks. I have no conception that General Le Duc ever made any such statement.

Mr. SCALES. I made no such imputation.

Mr. AIKEN. The question was asked by the gentleman, time and again, did not the Commissioner say that if his salary was increased to $6,000 it would not cost the Government a dollar more than now. And where was the additional $3,000 to come from except out of the pay of his clerks?

Mr. SCALES. That question was asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

Mr. AIKEN. And repeated by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.]

Mr. SCALES. It was repeated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and then I said that no member should vote for the appropriation unless it were reduced $3,000.

Mr. AIKEN. I am satisfied that the House does not understand it as the gentleman does, or did not hear the explanation made by the chairman of the committee. I repeat again, without intending to play the part of champion for General Le Duc or any other Government official, that I believe him incapable of making any such statement. But it must be well understood that if his salary is doubled General Le Duc might save a great deal to the Government because he could give more time to it and he would be better paid for that time and his labors. He is to day crippled for want of money to carry into effect the demands which are made upon the Department.

It is asserted upon this floor that $5,000 is not enough pay for a member of Congress, who is only here twelve months out of every twenty-four, and yet we expect a man who has to live here the year round and live as well as we do, and keep his family here, to do it upon $3,000. It is inconsistent, and I acknowledge that but for a lack of knowledge of law I would have made an effort before this to have his salary increased. In my humble judgment this officer is worth more to-day to the country than the head of any other Department in this city, and I assert that since the establishment of this Department there has been less extravagance displayed in it and less complaint made against it for spending the people's money than against any other Department.

The gentleman from Tennessee told us a while ago that the Department was not doing its duty to the great agricultural interests of the country. How can it do it when this Department is kept crippled by the Committee on Appropriations? The Commissioner made an estimate for $212,000; what has the committee done? It has reduced the appropriation to $167,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. AIKEN.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not want to occupy much of the time of the House, but I say that if the Commissioner of Agriculture had made a demand for $500,000 and the committee had dared to cut it down to $167,000 the agriculturists of the country would have risen en masse and demanded that he should have what was necessary to make his Department efficient.

Has the committee gone to the bureau to see what the duties are? Have they investigated the matter practically? I trow not. There are men there who are saving millions of money to the country, and I as a practical agriculturist know that one gentleman, to whom I was about to refer previously when my time expired, the superintendent of the public grounds, is by the strokes of his pen saving thousands of money to the practical agriculturists simply by edifying them as to the cereals and plants which they should or should not cultivate.

There are few men on this floor who know perhaps that the latitude of our country is so great that there are not two consecutive months in the year in which there is not both seed-time and harvest. This gentleman, by his letters and by his instructions, is saving thousands of dollars to the agriculturists by telling them what they shall grow and what they shall not.

When you come to measure the services of such a man as that by dollars and cents it is miserable parsimony to say that his services are only worth $2,000. I can say as an individual planter that since I have been acquainted with him he has saved me 20 per cent. upon that sum, and I am but a single individual of that class who constitute 52 per cent. of the entire population of our country.

Sir, that man is worth $10,000 a year, and that would be a paltry salary if his worth could be measured by dollars and cents. If you go to the office you will see him laboring not for six hours a day, but up frequently until twelve o'clock at night. He is working all the time for the benefit of the agricultural interest, and yet the committee tell us he is only to get a salary of $2,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman says that my amendment was drawn crudely. It was drawn rapidly from the Book of Estimates. I supposed that the salaries had been fixed by the committee in the order in which they appeared in the estimates of the Department. I therefore did not include some of the clerical force which had been omitted in that list, and which ought to be included. It is news to me, however, that General Le Duc, distinguished though he may be, was ever a practical farmer, or ever was guilty of anything which produced any practical results. It is well known to me and to every member upon this floor who has visited this Department that just now he is astraddle of a tea-plant, riding it as a hobby [laughter] for the purpose of finding out in what latitude it will best grow, and what sort of air will give to it the flavor which it has when grown in China and Japan. Now, if the learning which comes from the pen of such a distinguished agriculturist adds so much to the material wealth of the agriculturists of this country, then I think an appropriation should be made to purchase and circulate a book known as Horace Greeley on Farming, to be distributed among these gentlemen who learn from such crude sources what they did not before know about agriculture.

This Department distributes seeds in order that they may be adapted to all latitudes, so that farmers may obtain the best of products, and may get something that is of use to them. This winter my eyes were opened a little upon that point, and I had some little personal experience in this matter of seeds. One day as I went out of this Hall I ran up against a man whom I knew to be a large farmer in Wisconsin. I said to him, "What are you doing here?" He replied, "I came here for the purpose of finding out if I could not deal directly with the Department instead of through middlemen in Chicago and New York." I asked him to explain, and he said, "I raise seeds in Wisconsin and I sell them to a man in Chicago, and he sells them to the Department here in Washington or he sells them to some man in New York who sells them to the Commissioner of Agriculture. Then the Commissioner puts up those seeds, and you members of Congress are sending them back to the very same States in which they are grown, as rare seeds that ought to be cultivated, that the farmer should experiment with, and report at once to the Department how successful they are, and what is the best manner of treating those wonderful seeds."

I withdraw the whole of my amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I renew the amendment. I am unwilling to take up the time of the House in discussing agriculture, although I think I know as much about it as my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who is a lawyer.

Mr. BRAGG. I have read Greeley.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman says he has read Greeley. Then he may know something about agriculture, but I am sure his hands have never been made hard by holding a plow.

One word in reply to the satire of the gentleman. This is not the first time that we have heard gentlemen on this floor coming from all parts of the country undertaking to burlesque and belittle everything proposed here that is new and in the line of advancement. I say that the question of agriculture in this country is the greatest of all questions. Whenever you come to consider the agricultural interests of the country and give to them as much money in proportion as you do to other subjects, then you will have done more for the whole people of the country than by any other legislation that has taken place either in this Congress or any other Congress.

I am therefore in favor of fostering the Bureau of Agriculture by liberal appropriations. I am very sorry that the Committee on Appropriations has seen fit to strike at this the great interest of the country, and I call upon you, gentlemen, who represent agricultural districts almost exclusively, to see to it that your action here is such that when you go home you will not be called to account by your people because you sat here and allowed these important interests to be ruthlessly sacrificed.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend in line 1766 of the paragraph by striking out "$1,600" and inserting "$1,800" as the compensation of the disbursing clerk of the Agricultural Department. I find that the Revised Statutes provide that the salary of the disbursing clerk of the Agricultural Department shall be $1,800 a year. The statute in regard to disbursing clerks generally in all the Departments provides that they shall have, in addition to the salary of fourth-class clerks, a sufficient amount to make their compensation $2,000. I do not understand why it is that the disbursing clerk in the Agricultural Department should be given a less sum than the disbursing clerks in the other Departments.

It seems to me that this office is a responsible one, one that requires a competent man, who can keep accounts and keep them correctly. It requires a responsible man, who will handle money honestly and faithfully. I see no reason why the disbursing clerk in the Agricultural Department should receive even a less compensation than is given by law to a fourth-class clerk. I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. Let us have a vote.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Mr. HENDERSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HENDERSON and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 75, noes 69.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I shall call for a separate vote in the House on that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to further amend the pending paragraph by adding to it the following:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Department.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not object to the amendment, but I rise for the purpose simply of placing the Commissioner of Agriculture right before the House. I do not understand exactly the nature of the controversy on the other side of the House. My recollection is very distinct that the chief clerk of the Department of Agriculture, accompanied by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of this House, came before the Committee on Appropriations and represented that this gross sum would be sufficient for the running of that Department if it were given in this shape. They asked that the Commissioner and several other officers should have an increase of salary. I did not understand that one was made contingent upon the other; that is to say, that if we increased the salaries the other might be reduced. I understood that each proposition stood by itself, and that if this appropriation should be made in bulk the Commissioner could get along with eight or ten thousand dollars less.

Mr. ATKINS. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] I answer that the Commissioner of Agriculture appeared before our committee with revised estimates, and stated that with those revised estimates we could afford to increase his salary and all the salaries the increase of which has been provided for, as I understand, by the amendments of the gentleman from New Jersey, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. He said that these salaries could be increased, and yet the aggregate amount of appropriation would be less than the estimates that had been made for these identical and specific purposes. The original estimates provided for an expenditure of $91,380; whereas the revised estimates which the Commissioner of Agriculture himself handed in (and I now hold in my hand the original paper) amounted to $73,800, $42,500 of which was to be appropriated in bulk. In this estimate is included his own salary at $6,000. I ask the Clerk to read these revised estimates furnished by the Commissioner. I have made no comment or criticism upon the action of the Commissioner; but, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I could not do less than answer as I did. I could then have presented this paper, but I did not.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not want to misrepresent.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course not.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the gentleman quite sure that the Commissioner presented this paper? Was it not presented by the chief clerk of the bureau and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. ATKINS. The Commissioner of Agriculture, as I understood, concurred in this whole paper.

Mr. FOSTER. He may have concurred in it——

Mr. ATKINS. And he submitted the paper himself.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 12, 1878.

Revised estimates for the Department of Agriculture for fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Salary of Commissioner	$6,000
Salary of chief clerk	2,500
Salary of entomologist	3,000
Salary of chemist	3,000
Salary of superintendent of garden grounds	3,000
Salary of statistician	2,500
Salary of disbursing clerk	1,800
Salary of superintendent of seed-room	1,600
Salary of librarian	1,200
Salary of botanist	2,000
Salary of microscopist	2,000
Salary of assistant chemist	1,500
Salary of engineer	1,200
Salary of clerks, copyists, laborers, watchmen, carpenter, attendants in museum, &c	42,500
	73,800

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collecting agricultural statistics and compiling and writing matter for monthly, annual, and special reports, $5,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Department.

Mr. CUTLER. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "writing," in line 1783, the words "and publishing;" and in line 1784 strike out "$5,000" and insert "$15,000."

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will make it $10,000 I will assent to it.

Mr. CUTLER. On the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I modify my amendment by inserting "$10,000" instead of "$15,000."

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and distribution of new and valuable seeds and plants, and expense of putting up the same, $70,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$70,000" and inserting "$100,000." We heard a great deal said this morning about the importance and value of the agricultural interest of the country, all of which I indorse and approve; but I have not been able to see how the farming interests were to be benefited or injured by enlarging or decreasing the salary of an officer in the Agricultural Department to the extent of $100 per annum. But I believe that this Agricultural Department is a valuable auxiliary to the agriculture of the country, and this value is derived in large part from the ability of that Department to collect and distribute valuable seeds to farmers throughout the country. To enable this to be done properly and for the best interest of agriculture, I think this House ought to appropriate a liberal sum of money for the purpose. I hope, therefore, that the amount of this appropriation will be increased to $100,000.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I fully concur in the remark made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] when he rose, that it is impossible to see how the agricultural interest of this country is to be advanced or injured by increasing or decreasing a salary $100. But I want to reply to the gentleman's amendment by having read at the Clerk's desk the revised estimate of the Commissioner of Agriculture for this item.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase of seeds, &c., $70,000.

Mr. ATKINS. Now, there is the estimate of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I believe we appropriated for this purpose last year $65,000. Seventy thousand dollars, the amount named in the bill, is all that is asked now by the Commissioner of Agriculture. The original estimate was $75,000, but the revised estimate (in the handwriting perhaps of the chief clerk of the Agricultural Bureau, and a part of the same paper I had read a while ago) puts the amount at $70,000. I have no further remark to make.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I can very well see why the Commissioner of Agriculture might have limited his estimate to $70,000, supposing naturally from the great economy of the Committee on Appropriations that he could get no more money. But this House ought to take into consideration the demands of this Department, and not only the demands of the Department, but the demands of the whole country, and increase the amount to $100,000, as it is for the benefit of agriculture. We ought to enlarge the views of the Appropriations Committee. I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] should be adopted.

There are two Departments of this Government which this House should sustain beyond any question or doubt—the Agricultural Department and the Post-Office Department—as they come in closer contact with the people than all the others. They are for the benefit of the people. I speak of the Agricultural Department because I believe that it should be elevated to the position of a Department, as it represents the largest producing class of the country. I believe, as has been said here time and again, that the wealth of this country is based upon its agriculture, and that this Department, representing one of the most important elements of the country's wealth, should be elevated to its proper position in the Government. It should be recognized not only in this country but all over the world as one of the leading Departments of our system of government. No government is stronger than an agricultural government, none more conservative, none more honest.

I believe that $100,000 could be judiciously expended in securing seeds from various parts of the world and make the attempt, scientifically and practically, to acclimate those seeds to this country. We can never get a limit to the productive capacities of this country until we have experimented with the various seeds from all parts of the world and subjected them to our soil, our climate, our system of agriculture. In this way we have already utilized many seeds of the indigenous productions of other countries and made them great producers of our daily food. Therefore I think $100,000 could not be more wisely expended than in purchasing seeds from all parts of the country for distribution by the Agricultural Department to the people in various States. We should stand by agriculture, and should stand by this agricultural branch of the Government. The people look with suspicion and distrust at any attacks, direct or indirect, upon it. I say abolish other excrescences (which are numerous) hanging on to this Government as leeches, but preserve the agricultural branch of it. You may attribute follies to its workings, but no one charges crime upon it, and it stands almost alone at this place in that instance.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I have voted thus far and expect to vote against all the amendments which increase the amount of the appropriation contained in this bill, and as I represent as purely an agricultural district as any other member upon this floor, I desire to state my reasons for my course. The Constitution of this country is a singular document. It has at one time been construed to mean one thing, and at another period of our history it has meant another and entirely different thing. In casting my votes upon this floor on questions of appropriation I have uniformly tried to find in the Constitution some warrant somewhere for my action. In examining the debates on the Federal Constitution I have been unable to find anywhere that any proposition was ever adopted by that convention, while divers propositions were introduced, to confer upon the Federal Government authority to foster and protect agriculture. I have been unable, I say, to find anywhere the adoption of any one of those numerous propositions. I rose this morning for the purpose of asking my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to point to that particular clause of the Constitution and tell me where was the express power; and if he could find no express power, then I intended to ask him where the implied power lurked for this annual expenditure of $200,000 of the public money. I would pause now in order to give any constitutional lawyer upon this floor an opportunity to respond to that inquiry.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not propose to come under that head, but it is too late in the day now to say there is no power under the Constitution of the United States to expend one single dollar in promoting the great agricultural interests of this country. It is too late to preach any such doctrine.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I do not yield longer. If I know anything about the history of the law establishing this Agricultural Department it was passed in 1862 when every gentleman upon this floor must admit constitutional restraints rested lightly upon the people of this country both North and South. It was passed, Mr. Chairman, at a time when the protectionists of the country had gathered around this Capitol and were clamoring for protection, and this Agricultural Department was thrown out as a tub to the great agricultural whale of the country.

No, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution has conferred no such power upon the Federal Government. It was distinctly refused; and important and paramount as is this great interest, it has never been put in the keeping of this Government, but has been left to the States and the people, where it should be.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANNA. I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HANNA. Then I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia:

As far as practicable the seed shall be purchased directly from the producers, and the same shall be fairly and equitably apportioned to the several States.

Mr. MILLS. According to population.

Mr. HANNA. My only purpose is this: that in the event the amendment of my friend from Virginia is adopted, this provision ought to go along with it.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will accept the amendment that they shall be apportioned to the several States according to population.

Mr. HANNA. I offer this amendment in good faith, and it is for the purpose of settling a question which has been raised here that the seeds are not purchased directly from the producer. This involves the idea of purchasing directly from the man who produces the plant or seed. I think that is right. Secondly, it avoids any discrimination between sections, localities, or congressional districts, and gives us all a fair chance at the pile of seeds when collected.

Mr. MILLS. I ask my friend from Indiana whether he will not accept my amendment?

Mr. O'NEILL. This debate very properly has been confined so far to those representing agricultural districts and States, and it is very rare a member representing a city district in which there is not one acre of farm land desires to take part in discussing matters connected with the Agricultural Department. I wish to say here that our commercial cities are as deeply interested in the extension of agriculture and the increase of agricultural products as any other portions of the country. My constituents have had sent to them every package of garden and flower seeds which have been allotted to me by the Commissioner of Agriculture. Many of them own farms, and many of them own country seats, and are able to devote money and the time of those whom they employ to the cultivation and growing of such seeds. A great many have sent to them also the grain distributed by the Agricultural Department, and they also are cultivated; and in many instances the results of the cultivation of those flower and garden seeds and grain are transmitted to the Agricultural Department for its information and the information of agriculturists all over the land. Their letters and statements help intelligently to make up the annual reports on agriculture.

The district represented by my colleague, the Speaker, is similar to mine in regard to having no farm land in it. The other districts of Philadelphia have, to a considerable extent, each of them agricultural lands in them.

I was reminded to-day by a visit made here by the president of the permanent international exhibition of Philadelphia, Hon. Henry D. Moore, and one of its directors, Mr. J. B. Mitchell, of what was done for agriculture by the centennial exposition inaugurated May 10, 1876. I am persuaded, sir, that that exhibition did more for the interest of agriculture than almost anything else, or I might say more than anything else that has ever occurred in this country. Why, sir, the exhibits of mineral and agricultural products of the State of Kansas have had the effect I believe of attracting immense immigration to that great State. And so with the exhibits of other States of this country and the Territories. Out of that national exposition at Philadelphia, visited by more than ten millions of people, has grown a vast desire for the cultivation of flowers and fruits and grains and seeds of various kinds. And I for one desire to see the largest appropriations made for the Department of Agriculture to enable the present most admirable Commissioner to carry out his ideas as they should be carried out, for they are practical.

We have had distinguished Pennsylvania men holding that position. It was held some ten or fifteen years ago, and for a number of years, by Mr. Isaac Newton, a practical farmer of that State. Some years after him and until lately it was held by Hon. Frederick Watts, president for many years of the Agricultural Society of the State of Pennsylvania, a man of great learning, who had given a great deal of time to agricultural matters. And now their successor, the present incumbent, is a gentleman of enlarged views, and I believe if they are permitted to prevail by this committee, for I have never seen more intelligent devotion to the duties of a Department than in General Le Duc, we will never have occasion to regret it. The result, I believe, will be that the agricultural interests of this country will be properly cared for, and I am sure our constituents desire us to sustain him in his efforts.

Mr. Chairman, my attention was attracted during the debate this afternoon by a remark made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] He stated that the agricultural productions of that State amounted in one year to $210,000,000. He stated also that the manufacturing products amounted in value to $205,000,000. Agriculture and manufactures, Mr. Chairman, go together hand in hand and help to make up the greatness of this country. Agriculture, with manufactures, feeds commerce. Our seaboard cities are indebted to both for their increase in population and in prosperity. To-day Philadelphia is proud of her shipments to foreign ports of millions of bushels of grain and other agricultural products. Her railroad enterprises have enabled her to bring agricultural products in unbroken bulk from under the very hands of the farmer to the elevators and shipping at her wharves for foreign consumption; and while her local greatness is in her manufactures, she is rapidly reaching, if she has not reached already, the position of the largest shipper of grain and the products of agriculture than all our sea-ports to all parts of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [M. HUNTON.]

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in my power to accept that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it will have to be voted on by the committee.

Mr. HUNTON. It was offered as an amendment to my amendment and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "seeds," in line 1790, the following:

And as far as practicable the seeds shall be purchased directly from the producer, and the same shall be fairly and equally apportioned to the several congressional districts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that amendment being made a part of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. CUTLER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUTLER. Is not the amendment divisible? I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the latter portion of his amendment, for the reason that the Committee on Agriculture has now a bill nearly ready to report, directing in what manner the seeds shall be distributed by the Commissioner of Agriculture. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw that portion of his amendment.

Mr. HANNA. If the Committee on Agriculture should recommend an amendment in the same direction as what I have offered this will do no harm.

The question being taken on Mr. HANNA's amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose that it is unnecessary for me to say that I represent a purely agricultural district. There is not in my district—whether it be a fortunate or an unfortunate circumstance for it—a single manufacturing establishment.

Mr. O'NEILL. That is unfortunate for your district.

Mr. DURHAM. I am proud of my district because it is an agricultural district; and I am proud to say to the House also that I am a practical farmer. While I make that statement I am bound to state here to-day that I regard this Agricultural Department as the grandest humbug that was ever foisted upon the country. You talk about benefiting agriculture. The sending out of a few parcels of black-wax beans, a few parcels of garden-pease, a few parcels of inferior flower-seeds to benefit agriculture! A few packages my friend on my right suggests of ginseng seed!

I want those gentlemen who are so partial to agriculture to tell me how it is to benefit agriculture to expend this $70,000 on seeds. Even if you make it $100,000 how far will it go?

Now, what does the law require? And I undertake to say your present Commissioner is a humbug besides; he has not complied with one iota of the law as it exists on the statute-book. I have no prejudice against this present Commissioner.

Mr. AIKEN. Have you a prejudice against all humbugs?

Mr. DURHAM. I have.

Mr. AIKEN. Then how can you say you have not a prejudice against the Commissioner when you have just pronounced him a humbug?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir; I say he is a humbug, and I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will not interrupt me further. While I have no prejudice against him personally I may have a prejudice against him because he is a humbug.

Now what does the law require? The law does not require him to get black-wax beans, green pease, and flower-seeds. But if you will read the Revised Statutes you will find what he is bound to do; and I venture to say you may ransack the Department from one end to another and you will not find a seed or a plant there that is required by the Revised Statutes.

It is because it tickles the fancy of gentlemen who want to pander in the nature of demagogues, that you must increase these salaries beyond what they have been increased in any other Department. In addition to all that, let me state the fact that the increase asked by the Department for the benefit of agriculture was an increase of salaries, $25,000, and an increase of the appropriation for seeds, $11,000. The Book of Estimates, which I hold in my hand, shows that, and I tried to get the floor to show it in the earlier part of the debate.

The present Commissioner of Agriculture will never be charged with infidelity, because the good book says that any man who fails to take care of his own household is worse than an infidel, and General Le Duc will never do that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It is too late in the day to discuss the question whether the Department of Agriculture ought to have been established or not; perhaps if I had been here at the time I would have voted against it.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have read section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to show what are the duties of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I cannot yield. The Agricultural Department has been recognized by the Government and by the country as an established institution, and I contend that it ought to be conducted on a scale commensurate with its design, so that it may inure to the advantage of the whole country as much as possible. If you will look at the appropriation bill you will find that there is an appropriation of $167,000 for this Department.

Now, what is the main object of the Department? It is to distribute seeds and propagate plants and send them to the country, in order that all parts of the country may have the advantage of procuring and experimenting with new seeds of different varieties suitable to the various soils and climates of our country. To limit the appropriation for seeds and cuttings to $70,000 and pay $100,000 to run the machinery of this Department is an inconsistency which I cannot comprehend.

Mr. ATKINS. Whose fault is it that that discrepancy exists? We have followed the estimates of the Commissioner.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not know whose fault it is. I am not censuring the Committee on Appropriations. I have followed them through good and evil report, if there has been any evil in their action, but I say that if it costs $100,000 to run this bureau independent of the $70,000 appropriated for seeds, we ought to give them money enough to make the work effective.

Mr. ATKINS. We give them all they ask for.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Well, they may not ask for enough. They are not there to judge what the people want; that is for the Representatives of the people. If we appropriate enough to pay officers and employés, then every dollar after that goes to the people.

If the Commissioner only asks for $5,000 or $10,000 to enable him to distribute seeds, all the other expense would be as much, and the question is are we willing to pay a hundred thousand dollars in order to have seventy thousand dollars' worth of seeds distributed? I think there ought to be more appropriated for this purpose.

In regard to the Commissioner of Agriculture I would say that I never saw or knew or heard of him until he took charge of the bureau; since then I have been thrown into official relations with him frequently, and a more polite, accomplished, and accommodating public officer I have never met with in the whole of my eight years' service upon the floor of Congress. I believe he is competent and efficient and that he discharges the duties of his office with great fidelity and ability, and therefore I think he ought to be sustained by this House so long as he continues to occupy the office.

If we are to have an Agricultural Department let us appropriate enough to make it useful to the people. If we cannot afford this, then abolish the Department.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have been a practical farmer since I was thirteen years old. [Laughter.] I was considered by a good judge as capable of doing a good day's work at that time, and I want to give for the benefit of Congress and the country a little of my experience of Government garden-seeds.

I found to my surprise here three years ago that I was entitled to a bagful of garden and flower seeds and I went and made my politest bow to the Commissioner of Agriculture and he sent them to my farm in Connecticut. When I got them there I gave them away and went to market and bought my own seeds, and those to whom I gave the Government seeds have never forgotten me to this day for having swindled them. [Laughter.] Now, sir, the next year after I received another, a smaller bag of garden-seeds.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is that the only time you have swindled your constituents? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. You must apply to my constituents for an answer to that question.

Last year, as I was saying, I had another bag of garden-seeds, a small one this time, and I put an advertisement in the newspaper in my village that anybody that wanted to experiment with Government garden-seeds might have a small assortment by calling at the door of my house so long as the supply lasted. The result was just the same as in the first instance.

I mean to make no sport of this thing; but my experience in this matter is that three-fourths of the garden-seeds that are now distributed under your present appropriations are worthless or in practice wasted. Moreover, on principle, I ask members of this House to reflect a moment and think how long it will be if they go on at this proposed rate and act upon the principle—which seems popular here—that every farmer and every gardener in this country has to be petted and assisted by being furnished with seeds free, how long will it be before your appropriations for that purpose will amount to millions?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DURHAM. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

And said seeds shall be distributed to each congressional district in the several States and Territories in proportion to the agricultural population residing in the same.

If there is no objection to the amendment I do not desire to say anything, except that I am satisfied the distribution of seeds by the Agricultural Department has not been heretofore upon the principle of my amendment. I think the law ought to require that these seeds shall be distributed in proportion to the agricultural population.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to say a word or two upon this subject of the Agricultural Department and its work in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.] If the honorable gentleman from New York is a practical farmer, all that I can say is that his remarks upon this floor show wanton and willful ignorance of some of the great facts that underlie that pursuit which he has so misstated and the work of which he so little understands.

I represent an agricultural district, and I know what the work of this Department has been, and the good it has done in that great western country which I in part represent. I can point you in the different States of the West to more than twenty, ay, more than fifty varieties of the leading products of the country, grain and other staples, which are produced by the agricultural classes, that have been of untold benefit to the people, and which never would have been discovered or heard of had it not been for just such an organization as this Department of Agriculture.

In my own State we had the same talk that we have heard here to-day from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] about these agricultural associations and organizations being of no practical benefit. What has been the result? By means of our State Agricultural Society and our State Horticultural Society and our agricultural organizations, we have produced a better system of agricultural reports than any other state in the Union.

Mr. DURHAM. Did I say anything about State organizations?

Mr. HASKELL. As the result of our agricultural organizations, we made the best display at the centenial exposition of any State in the Union, of fruits and agricultural products. That was the sole work of agricultural organizations similar to the national organization here which has been so much decried.

Now, what is the result of all that? To-day hundreds and thousands of people are flocking to the best agricultural State in the Union, because of the advertisement, because of the information, because of the valuable statistics that this organization of ours has been able to place in the hands of the people.

Take that one single product which has been so much sneered at, sorghum. Where did it come from and how was it introduced into this country? It was introduced by your national association, by the Agricultural Department. All through the West you will see fields to-day green with that product, and millions have been put into the pockets of the agriculturists of the West from that one single discovery of sorghum. The molasses and the sugar that have been produced from it will more than pay every dollar that you have expended upon the Agricultural Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired and debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will withdraw his amendment to the amendment I will renew it.

Mr. MILLS. I will do so.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I renew the amendment. I have been very much surprised this morning by the attack which has been made upon the present Commissioner of Agriculture. In my intercourse as a representative of the people with that officer I have found that intercourse marked with courtesy and an exhibition of anxiety on his part to meet the demands and wishes and interests of the people. I have found him willing to consult and be consulted with. I have found him anxious to discharge his duty as a public officer.

I am surprised that gentlemen, Representatives upon this floor, should make this attack upon one of the established institutions of this Government, the institution which in its operations has convinced one portion of the people that there is a Government for their benefit. The other Departments by their administration take money from the people. This is the only one that gives back any benefit to them.

I have to say for at least one congressional district of this Union that since I have had the honor to represent it upon this floor I can truthfully say that the benefit it has derived from the Agricultural Department has been more than all your appropriations for seeds and for its entire support. We have felt its benefit in the introduction of improved varieties of wheat, for instance, and in other respects, but more markedly in regard to wheat. No man can go to the middle portion of Tennessee and witness the immense growth of wheat there and trace it to its source without recognizing the benefit which must be accredited to the Agricultural Department of the General Government.

I might also mention another thing which has been laughed at and ridiculed by gentlemen. Yet those of my constituents who belong to the other sex constantly remind me that in times past as in the present they have been greatly favored by the Agricultural Department. I know that in the expression of their wishes they recognize some benefit as derived from the Department of Agriculture. Knowing what their demands and wishes are, am I here to say that they have no sense, that they do not understand what they are about?

One word more. Knowing my colleague [Mr. CALDWELL] as I do, knowing whence he sprang, and all his associations, I am surprised that at this late hour he should raise a constitutional objection on this subject. Sir, the child might with as much propriety object to the source from which it receives its nourishment or to the power by which it is created. Does the child dispute the source of its life? We are dependent upon agriculture. Out of it springs the support not only of the Government but of all the associated industrial interests of our country. When we neglect to give it protection, if protection it can be called, we neglect our mother.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURHAM. I will ask the Clerk to read two sections of the Revised Statutes, and upon them I will base my remarks. But before they are read I will say that I do not want any gentlemen of the committee to think I have cast any reflection upon the personal honor or integrity of the Commissioner of Agriculture. The reason I called him a "humbug" was that he is undertaking to do things which he never can accomplish in this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Not unless we help him.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask the Clerk to read the two sections of the Revised Statutes that I have indicated. I hope the Committee of the Whole will listen to them.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 527. The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

SEC. 529. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall, on or before the 15th day of December in each year, make a report in detail to Congress of all moneys expended by him or under his direction.

Mr. DURHAM. Now, I do not believe any gentleman on this floor can deny that the largest part of these appropriations has been for common and ordinary seeds, such as can be obtained in any of the drug stores throughout the length and breadth of the country. While all of us go to the Department and get our portions and send them out, because it is somewhat common to do so, I do not believe that the present Commissioner has complied with the provisions of the statutes.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Has not the gentleman himself gone to the Department and asked for these identical seeds?

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly I have, and I have sent them out.

Mr. CRITTENDEN rose.

Mr. DURHAM. I decline to yield to the gentleman further. Now, in reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] I will say that I have not intimated any opposition to agricultural associations. I want such associations encouraged, and I do my part toward their encouragement in the section of the country where I live. The farming interest does not look to the Agricultural Department for relief. As I asked a while ago, what do seventy thousand or one hundred thousand dollars' worth of seeds amount to when distributed among the agriculturists of this broad country? No, sir; they demand of you to rectify your high and expensive tariff; they demand of you rigid economy in all branches of the Government. They demand that you reorganize every Department of this Government, and run it upon an economical basis. They demand that the currency of the country shall be regulated. These are the things that the agricultural interests of the country demand—not a few seeds from the Agricultural Department.

Mr. ATKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. I trust the chairman of the committee [Mr. ATKINS] will allow section 526 of the Revised Statutes to be read.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir, I will.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 526. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power; he shall collect new and valuable seeds and plants; shall test, by cultivation, the value of such of them as may require such tests; shall propagate such as may be worthy of propagation; and shall distribute them among agriculturists.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If the chairman of the committee will allow me, I would like to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.] I see that he finds fault with the Commissioner of Agriculture for distributing pease and beans. Now I want to tell the gentleman that in a great many congressional districts of this country people eat beans and pease; they are an important addition to the humble meal of the farmer; and there are a very few districts in this country where people can subsist on simply Bourbon whisky and tobacco. [Great laughter.]

Mr. ATKINS. I now ask for a vote, if it be agreeable to the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding after the word "dollars" the following:

And said seeds shall be distributed to each congressional district in the several States and Territories in proportion to the agricultural population residing in the same.

Mr. McCOOK. I do not want to make a point of order on that——

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to make a point of order. The amendment has been discussed.

Mr. McCOOK. But I would suggest to the strict constitutional constructionists on the other side that this excludes the city districts altogether from the benefit of this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If, under the amendment which has just been adopted, sugar-cane, rice, and cotton should be distributed through the northern congressional districts, ought not the law to provide some way to change the temperature of those districts and the quality of the soil, so that these things may be raised there?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary question. That is for the committee, and not for the Chair, to determine.

The question occurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. COVERT demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 81.

Mr. HUNTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, the Chair will order tellers, and appoint Mr. HUNTON and Mr. BLOUNT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment:

Add to line 1790 the following:

Provided, That $12,000 of said sum shall be expended for the establishment of a commission, to consist of a competent veterinary surgeon with two practical stock-breeders, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, at a salary of $2,000 each, whose duty it shall be to have charge of the investigation of contagious diseases of farm stock, their causes, means of prevention, &c.; and also to report to the Government from time to time such measures as they may deem necessary for Congress to adopt to prevent the importation of such diseases from abroad, and the spread of contagion, and the extermination of such as may exist.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MILLS. So do I; that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. It creates new offices, and is liable to the point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order until I can be heard on the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I must insist on the point of order. We are losing time on this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I desire, if the point of order is made on that amendment, to move another, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to expend $10,000 of said sum in the investigation of contagious diseases of farm stock, their causes and means of prevention; and it shall be his duty to report to Congress such measures as he may deem necessary for Congress to adopt to prevent the importation of such diseases from abroad, and the spread of contagion, and the extermination of such as may exist.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that is not germane to the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Then I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph, so that I may be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. The amendment proposed looks in the direction of legislation for the prevention of the importation of diseased stock into this country and the establishing of such measures as will prevent the spread of infectious diseases, such as rinderpest, Texas fever, pleuro-pneumonia, &c. This subject has been carefully considered by our stock-raisers. The American Short-Horn-Breeders' Association, at their annual meeting in November last at Lexington, Kentucky, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to provide for the establishment of a commission, to consist of a competent veterinary surgeon with two or more practical stock-breeders, whose duty it shall be to have charge of the investigation of contagious diseases of farm stock, their causes, means of prevention, treatment, &c.; and also to report to the Government from time to time such measures as they may deem necessary for Congress to adopt to prevent the importation of such diseases from abroad and the spread of the contagion, and the extermination of such as may exist.

The author of this resolution is one of the associate editors of the National Live-Stock Journal, published at Chicago, and is a practical stock-raiser. It embraces the plan which they think will most likely result in the adoption of some means to protect our farmers and stock-raisers from the fearful ravages of these infectious diseases that destroy alike the extensive herds of the stock-raisers, the small herds of the farmer, and the widow's cow.

My proposition is not to establish a commission, (although I would be willing to do that,) but to provide that this investigation shall be made by the Commissioner of Agriculture. He may call to his aid veterinary surgeons and practical stock-raisers, many or few, so he keeps within the amount of the appropriation made; and we can thus secure the necessary information to enable us to legislate intelligently on this subject. The laws passed by the Western States to protect themselves against the spread of the Texas fever, I am informed, have been held to be unconstitutional, upon the theory that it is an attempt by State Legislatures to regulate commerce between the States, a power that belongs to Congress under the Constitution of the General Government.

We have recently been shipping live stock to England, and it was fast becoming one of the important features in our foreign trade; but recently, however, owing to the fact that we in this country take no efficient measures to prevent the spread of infectious diseases among our stock, the British government proposes to prevent us with other countries from shipping live stock to England. A bill has been introduced in Parliament which prohibits the landing of all foreign cattle, including those from the United States, except at a port defined for that purpose by order of the council, to be called a foreign animals' wharf, and are not to be moved out of quarantine station before the expiration of such period, not less than fourteen days, as the privy council may prescribe. Stock men say if this bill becomes a law it will put an end to the exportation of live cattle from this country to England and thus destroy what was bidding fair to become an important item in our foreign traffic. Owing to the condition of our beef (dead meat) when shipped, we cannot compete successfully with the English in their market; but in the live-stock market it is different, and our stock-raisers, if not hampered by unfriendly legislation, can compete successfully. If we take steps to prevent the spread of contagion and that look to its extermination, we may hope to secure a modification of the proposed English trade regulations. Otherwise our live stock will be practically excluded and this prospect of foreign trade destroyed. This subject is one of great magnitude. Our stock-raisers and farmers have suffered immense losses from the spread of rinderpest, Texas fever, and pleuro-pneumonia. Perhaps our greatest immediate danger is from the spread of pleuro-pneumonia. The ravage of this disease is beyond calculation. It was introduced into England by the importation of a cow from Holland, and Professor Law, who has given the subject of infectious diseases among stock more attention than any man in this country, says:

Up to 1869, it is estimated that England had lost, almost exclusively from this disease, 5,549,780 head of cattle, worth £83,616,854, (say $400,000,000.) For the succeeding nine years, up to 1878, the losses have been, in the main, as extensive, so that we may set them down as now reaching at least $500,000,000 in deaths alone, without counting all the contingent expenses, of deteriorated health, loss of markets, progeny, crops, manure, &c., disinfection, quarantine, &c. With us no attempts have been made to estimate the losses, but they cannot exceed an inconsiderable fraction of those above named; and thus we have slept on in a pleasant dream of immunity.

This disease was brought to this country in 1843, and Professor Law traces it from the Brooklyn cattle-yards through a portion of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, and Connecticut, and although this disease has been confined to the Eastern States it is gradually making its way westward, and unless steps are taken to prevent its spread and to stamp it out the loss to our farmers and stock-raisers will be simply incalculable. I put the inquiry to this House in the language in which Professor Law puts it to the country in a recent article on the subject in the National Live-Stock Journal:

Shall we learn from the disastrous experience of others, and extirpate the lung plague from the United States while it is still possible? Or shall we sit quietly by with folded hands and await the inevitable, early or late, infection of our open western stock-ranges, and then repeat, for the benefit of other nations, the already twice-told tale of a desperate and extravagant but fruitless attempt to suppress a plague which we have criminally allowed to pass beyond our control? With or without a prodigal but vain effort to crush out the poison, the results may be thus summed up: the infection of stock-yards, loading-banks, cars, and markets, and a general diffusion of the plague over the Eastern States. This would imply a national loss, by cattle disease, like that of England, but much more extensive in ratio with our greater numbers of stock. Thus England with her six million head of cattle has lost in death alone, from lung fever, in the course of forty years, over $500,000,000; we, therefore, with our twenty-eight million head, should lose not less than $2,000,000,000 in the same length of time, allowing still a wide margin for the lower average value a head in America.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Clerk to read section 2493 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2493. The importation of neat-cattle and the hides of neat-cattle from any foreign country into the United States is prohibited: Provided, That the operation of this section shall be suspended as to any foreign country or countries, or any parts of such country or countries, whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall officially determine, and give public notice thereof, that such importation will not tend to the introduction or spread of contagious or infectious diseases among the cattle of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered, and it shall be his duty, to make all necessary orders and regulations to carry this law into effect, or to suspend the same as therein provided, and to send copies thereof to the proper officers in the United States, and to such officers or agents of the United States in foreign countries as he shall judge necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] withdraw the formal amendment?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I withdraw the formal amendment; but I desire the action of the committee on the other amendment which I offered, if it is not ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been sustained on that amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1790 insert the following:

And said seeds shall be distributed to each congressional district in the several States and Territories in proportion to the agricultural population residing in the same.

Mr. ATKINS. That was voted down before.

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; it was voted up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. It was put on by the committee as an amendment to another amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. And the whole was voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. But as a separate proposition this was not voted down. On the contrary, it was agreed to by the committee as an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. RIDDLE. I wish to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. I ask the gentleman from Texas to accept the addition of these words:

And the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be distributed in the same way.

Mr. MILLS. That is not germane.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made too late.

Mr. BROWNE. I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to except from its operation flower-seeds; so that it will read:

And said seeds, except flower-seeds, shall be distributed to each congressional district in the several States and Territories in proportion to the agricultural population residing in the same.

Mr. RIDDLE. Did the Chair rule out my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asked the gentleman from Texas to accept it and the gentleman from Texas declined to accept it.

Mr. MILLS. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE.]

Mr. PAGE. Now, then, the point of order is not too late. I make it against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which will carry the whole thing with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane and is in order.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the amendment just adopted the following:
Provided, That no more than $7,000 of this amount shall be used in the putting up and distribution of said seeds and plants.

I think there can be no objection to that; it is a liberal proportion.

Mr. ATKINS. We only gave $5,000 last year; but I have no objection to this.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer also the following amendment:

Add these words:
And provided further, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased and the date of purchase.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CUTLER. I offer the following amendment:

Amend line 1788 by inserting after the word "purchase" the words "for propagation;" in line 1790 strike out "$70,000" and insert "$75,000."

Mr. ATKINS. I ask for a division of that amendment.

Mr. CUTLER. Do you consent to the first portion of it?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read the first portion of the amendment, as follows:

Amend line 1788 by inserting after the word "purchase" the words "for propagation;" so that it will read: "for purchase for propagation and distribution of new and valuable seeds, plants," &c.

The first portion of the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the second portion of the amendment, as follows:

In line 1790 strike out "$70,000" and insert "$75,000."

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to state that the appropriation last year was $65,000.

Mr. CUTLER. Seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand it to have been $75,000, and this appropriation would make the appropriation precisely the same as last year.

Mr. CUTLER. I offer this amendment that the appropriation may be the same as that of last year.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not object to it.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. KEIFER. I offer the following amendment:

Insert after the word "distribution," in line 1788, the words "as required by law." Strike out of line 1788 the words "new and valuable." After the word "seeds" insert the words "trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings."

I desire just a moment in explanation of this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. If the amendment is accepted by the Committee on Appropriations, then I do not desire to say anything.

Mr. SAMPSON. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this proposes to strike out of the law the provision that the Commissioner shall only distribute new and valuable seeds; that he shall expend money for the purchase and distribution of new and valuable varieties of seeds.

Mr. KEIFER. I will answer that. The bill as originally drawn uses the words "new and valuable." They are doubtless taken from section 526 of the Revised Statutes, which states it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to collect new and valuable seeds and plants for the purpose of testing by cultivation their value. Now, by section 527 of the Revised Statutes it is made the duty of the Department of Agriculture to purchase and distribute seeds that are rare and uncommon in the country. This bill, as drawn, would seem to change the general law on the subject and to make it the duty of the Department of Agriculture simply to distribute new seeds, not rare ones. The object of this amendment is to provide that it shall be the duty of the Department of Agriculture to purchase and distribute just such seeds as are provided for in section 527 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. SAMPSON. The object of the amendment, then, is to make the provision more stringent than it is in the bill. In that case I have no objection to it.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me say further that an examination of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which has been once read to-day at the Clerk's desk, will show this clause does not go far enough in another direction. It only provides, as originally drawn, for the distribution of new and valuable seeds and plants. But section 527 requires something more; that is, the purchase and propagation of trees, shrubs, vines, and cuttings. This seems to have been entirely overlooked in drawing this clause of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state that we followed the nomenclature as we found it in section 527 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Not as the bill is drawn?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, it is.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it would absolutely exclude all trees, cuttings, &c.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the committee understands the matter and I hope we shall have a vote.

The question was put upon the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to add to the paragraph the following:

But nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same.

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For repairs of building, heating-apparatus, furniture, water and gas pipes, and new furniture, carpets, and matting, and for constructing ventilators for museum, $4,000.

Mr. ITTNER. I move to amend that paragraph by inserting, after the word "building," the words "drives and walks," and also by adding $600 to the appropriation.

I desire to say to the committee, and especially to the gentleman having charge of this bill, that some three or four weeks ago, when I visited the Agricultural Department, in a conversation which I had with Mr. Saunders, superintendent of the propagating gardens, I asked him why his drives and walks were in such a miserable condition, and he said that they received no appropriation to repair them; that the Commissioner of Agriculture had recommended to the last Congress an appropriation of $500 for this purpose, but that it was disallowed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, in looking over this bill I have not seen any provision for this purpose, and hence it is that I offer the amendment. As the walks now are, they are in a worse condition than they were then, and I have allowed an additional $100 for this purpose in my amendment. I hope the committee will see the propriety of granting it.

Mr. ATKINS. In the estimates made by the Commissioner there is none for the purpose, and this is the first time I have heard of it. I do not know either of any law authorizing it.

Mr. BEEBE. Would not the point of order lie against it?

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late, as the amendment has been discussed.

The question was put; and on a division there were ayes 20, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For chemicals and apparatus for the use of the microscopist, $1,500.

Mr. CUTLER. I move to amend that paragraph by inserting before the word "microscopist" the words "chemist and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For stationery, freight and express charges, fuel, lights, subsistence and care of horses, and repair of harness and wagon, paper, twine, and gum for folding-room, and for incidental and miscellaneous items, namely, for advertising, telegraphing, dry-goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, and care of stationery, purchasing supplies, and for other necessary items, $3,000.

For postage on return letters, circulars, and miscellaneous articles, for correspondents and foreign letters, $4,000.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move to insert the following:

After the word "dollars," in line 1821, insert: "The reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be apportioned to members of Congress according to the agricultural population of their respective districts."

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope that amendment will not prevail. I think it is making this distribution very exclusive.

Mr. RIDDLE. If the amendment is objected to, I withdraw it, for I suppose it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. McCOOK. It is no worse than the amendment adopted by the committee a while ago.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

JUDICIAL.

United States courts:

For the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, $10,500, and for eight associate justices, $10,000 each; in all, $90,500.

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following, to come in as a new paragraph after the one which has just been read:

To pay the salaries of the United States judges retired under section 714 of the Revised Statutes so much as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, is hereby approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I am also instructed by the committee to offer the following, to come in as a new paragraph:

For the purchase by the Librarian of Congress of new books of reference for the Supreme Court to be a part of the Library of Congress and purchased under the direction of the Chief-Justice, $3,500.

I submit as a part of my remarks a letter upon this subject which I received from the Chief-Justice. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed is the form of an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill which I prepare in accordance with your suggestion yesterday. If adopted, I shall apply $1,500 to the purchase of reports for our consultation-room and $2,000 for books of reference to be kept by the justices in their own rooms. The $1,500 will enable us to fill up the sets of reports in the consultation-room. These we can control ourselves, which is to us a matter of very great importance.

The $2,000 will be divided among the justices to be expended under their direction for such books of reference as they require at their rooms.

Very respectfully, yours,

M. R. WAITE.

Hon. JOHN D. C. ATKINS, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM. I would say to the gentleman that the provision in relation to the payment of retired judges made in this bill applies only to the Revised Statutes, and does not include those who have been retired by special law since that time. There was one judge eighty years of age who was retired during the last Congress by a special law. Provision should be made for the payment of those who have been retired in that manner.

Mr. ATKINS. The object of my amendment was to provide for three retired judges, two of the Court of Claims and one other.

Mr. LAPHAM. We should also provide for those judges who have been retired in pursuance of acts of Congress passed subsequent to the adoption of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I will suggest to the gentleman that it would probably be better to let the matter be considered when we come to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For salaries of the fifty-one district judges of the United States, $190,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And section 619 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be amended to read as follows:

And the circuit courts of the United States shall have the appointment of their own clerks, the circuit and district judges concurring; and in case of a disagreement between the judges, the appointment shall be made by the associate justice of the Supreme Court allotted to such circuit, except in cases otherwise specially provided by law.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Appropriations agree to this amendment, and unless some gentleman desires an explanation——

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNA. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after "$190,000" the words "$500 of which sum shall be paid to the judge of the district of Indiana in addition to the salary now fixed by law.

Mr. ATKINS. That amendment is liable to a point of order.

Mr. HANNA. I was aware when I offered it that it was subject to a point of order; but I wish to make a statement, and then I hope the Committee on Appropriations will not object to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] reserve his point of order?

Mr. ATKINS. I must insist upon my point of order.

Mr. HANNA. I do not like to do anything by indirection that ought to be done by direction.

Mr. ATKINS. I will not object to the gentleman explaining the object of his amendment, but I will reserve my point of order.

Mr. HANNA. Section 554 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

District judges are entitled to receive yearly salaries at the following rates, payable quarterly from the Treasury: the judge of the district of California $5,000; the judge of the district of Louisiana, $4,500; the judges of the district of Massachusetts; the northern, southern, and eastern districts of New York; the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania; the district of New Jersey; the district of Maryland; the southern district of Ohio, and the northern district of Illinois, $4,000. The judges of all other districts $3,500. No other allowance or payment shall be made to them for travel, expenses, or otherwise.

I now ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to what I am about to say. The district judge in my district, the State of Indiana, forming the district, comes within the $3,500 clause. By existing law he is required not only to hold court at Indianapolis, but also at Evansville, in an extreme part of the State, and at Jeffersonville. The necessary extra expenses of travel in holding court at these two additional points more than exceed the sum of $500. As a matter of justice I ask that the salary of that judge be increased in addition to the amount allowed by law. While I admit that my amendment is subject to a point of order, I think the justice of it is so fair and reasonable, when we take into consideration the character and amount of services performed by this judge that the amendment should not be objected to.

Mr. ATKINS. If I were not to insist upon the point of order in this case, I should be met with similar propositions from all around the House. I therefore must insist upon my point of order that the proposed amendment increases salaries beyond the amount authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BACON. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$190,000" and inserting "$255,000." The object of that amendment is to make the salaries of these district judges $5,000 each.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law and increases salary.

Mr. BACON. The law ought to be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For salaries of the three judges of the southern claims commission, at $4,000 each, $12,000.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$4,000" and inserting "$5,000," and also by striking out "$12,000" and inserting "$15,000;" so as to make the salaries of the three judges of the southern claims commission $5,000 each. I hope that the gentleman in charge of this bill, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will consent to this amendment. If he will do so I will say no more, for I had a great deal rather carry the amendment than make a speech on it.

Mr. ATKINS. The Committee on Appropriations duly considered this matter. This southern claims commission is not nearly as important a court as the Court of Claims; and yet the judges of the southern claims commission have been receiving a larger salary than the judges of the Court of Claims, the one receiving $5,000 each and the other $4,500.

Mr. HALE. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not consent to this amendment——

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot.

Mr. HALE. Then I will give my reasons for it. I have moved the amendment in good faith. There is no body of men in the Government that has done more faithful service than the judges of the southern claims commission. Heretofore they have received a salary of $5,000 each, and nobody has objected to it. We have now limited their term of service so that it will expire in March next.

While it is undoubtedly not the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations, yet perhaps it will be considered and properly considered by these judges that a stigma is placed upon them in the last year of their valuable services by being selected for a reduction of salary. Now, let them go on at $5,000 a year for the little time left them, and let them go out of office with the record of a court that has done well, exceedingly well.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] says that the judges of the Court of Claims receive only $4,500 each, while the judges of the southern claims commission have been receiving $5,000 a year. Sir, the judges of the Court of Claims have life positions; they are here assuredly for life, or till seventy years of age when they are placed on the retired list. When retired they have the benefit of retired pay for the remainder of their lives. Nothing of the kind applies to the judges of the southern claims commission; they are here only temporarily. Upon an average these judges decide two thousand cases a year more than are decided by any other court I know of either of the States or of the United States. It certainly cannot be necessary at this time that we should strike at them in the last brief remnant of their official existence. I hope the committee will consent to put their salaries back, as my amendment proposes, to what it has heretofore been, so that these officers whose good services are known to you Mr. Chairman, [Mr. EDEN,] as chairman of the Committee on War Claims, and to every gentleman in this House who has had occasion to look into the subject, may continue to receive the salary which they have heretofore received. I hope that my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will yield the point even if the committee has not agreed to this proposition, and will let these gentlemen continue to receive what they are now receiving.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like very much indeed to accommodate my colleague on the committee, [Mr. HALE,] but the committee have duly considered this matter; they have weighed the services of the southern claims commissioners as compared with those of other judges in this city and with judges throughout the country; and we feel satisfied that a salary of $4,000 is sufficient. As this is the view of the committee, I as chairman do not feel authorized to yield the position. I call for a vote.

Mr. HALE. I am willing the vote shall be taken without further discussion.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HALE, there were—ayes 65 noes 75; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. DURHAM were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 83.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Attorney-General:

For compensation of the Attorney-General, $8,000; Solicitor-General, $6,000; two Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; one Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-office Department, $4,000; Solicitor of the Internal Revenue, $4,500; examiner of claims, $3,500; law clerk and examiner of titles, $2,700; chief clerk, $2,200; stenographic clerk, $1,500; one law clerk, $2,000; five clerks of class 4; additional for disbursing clerk, $200; one clerk of class 2; two clerks of class 1; five copyists; one telegraph operator, at $1,000; two assistant messengers; two pages, at $480 each; for laborers, $1,200; and watchmen, $1,200; in all, $67,700. And so much of section 348 of the Revised Statutes as provides for the appointment and payment of more than two Assistant Attorneys-General is hereby repealed, and said section is hereby so modified and amended as to prohibit the appointment and payment of more than two Assistant Attorneys-General until otherwise provided. And so much of section 349 of the Revised Statutes as provides for the appointment and payment of a salary to a "naval solicitor" is hereby repealed, and the office is abolished.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1866 strike out "2" and insert "3;" in line 1878 strike out "2" wherever it occurs and insert "1;" in line 1879 strike out the word "each;" in line 1881 strike out "$67,700" and insert $71,500;" and strike out in lines 1882 to 1888 the following:

And so much of section 348 of the Revised Statutes as provides for the appointment and payment of more than two Assistant Attorneys-General is hereby repealed, and said section is hereby so modified and amended as to prohibit the appointment and payment of more than two Assistant Attorneys-General until otherwise provided.

Mr. ATKINS. I will explain briefly the effect of this amendment. The bill as reported provides for only two Assistant Attorneys-General, while the existing law provides for three. The committee propose to restore the latter number. This is the effect of the first amendment. The other amendments refer to messengers and pages. The bill provides for two assistant messengers and two pages. We propose to amend by providing for one assistant messenger and one page. The amendment also strikes out the provision repealing so much of the Revised Statutes as provides for more than two Assistant Attorneys-General. This is designed to make the bill conform to the amendment restoring three Assistant Attorneys-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move to amend by striking out "two Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; one Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, $4,000;" and inserting the following:

Four Assistant Attorneys-General, one of whom shall be for the Post-Office Department, at a salary each of $4,500.

Mr. ATKINS. I raise a point of order on that amendment. It creates a new office not provided for by existing law.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it does not do so.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman refer to the law on that subject?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Yes, sir. My amendment simply provides that the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department shall receive the same compensation as the other Assistant Attorneys-General. At present the latter receive $5,000, while he receives but $4,000. There is no reason in the world for this discrimination. He has quite as much work to do as any of them. I propose simply to put the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department in the same category with the other Assistant Attorneys-General and to pay him the same salary. My amendment fixes the salary of each of these officers at $4,500, so that in point of fact it makes a reduction of expenditures. It takes $1,500 from the aggregate salaries of three Assistant Attorneys-General to whom this bill proposes to give $5,000 each, and it adds $500 to the compensation of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department. So that the amendment makes an absolute reduction of expenditures and is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I admit, after hearing the gentleman's explanation, that the amendment is not subject to a point of order. I withdraw the point. I misunderstood the effect of the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a communication addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. This paper will give the House some idea of the arduous duties devolving upon and discharged by the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIR: The office of Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department was created by the act of Congress passed June 8, 1872. The duties of this officer consist mainly—

First. In the examination of all contracts made by the Department.

Second. The examination of all recommendations made by the Sixth Auditor for the remission of fines and penalties under section 409 of the Revised Statutes.

Third. The instructions of special agents in all matters of prosecutions for violations of postal laws.

Fourth. The examination and passing upon of all claims against the Department including claims growing out of leases, contracts for carrying the mails, and for the manufacture of stamps, envelopes, &c., and for furnishing the Department with stationery, &c.

Fifth. In advising and assisting the Department of Justice in the defense of all suits against the Government growing out of transactions with the Post-Office Department.

Sixth. In furnishing such information and imparting such instructions as will enable the several marshals and district attorneys to properly execute the postal laws.

Seventh. In passing upon all questions of mail classifications herein, of determining what is and what is not mailable, and the amount of postage chargeable for mailable matter of the several classes.

Eighth. In advising the Postmaster-General and each of the Assistant Postmasters-General on all matters touching which his advice is asked.

Something of the extent of the duties devolved upon this officer can be inferred when it is stated that over one thousand questions are annually submitted for his consideration.

The office of Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department has never received the consideration its importance demands. The questions growing out of the operations of more than thirty thousand mail-routes, the infinite variety of intricacies arising out of a Department that ramifies itself with every relation of life, industrial, social, moral, political, and religious; that permeates every neighborhood and visits every fireside; the construction of every phase of the law of contracts; the application of the many principles of criminal law growing out of almost constant perpetration of mail depredations in some form; the frequent adjustment or determination of conflicting claims arising out of the registered letter and money-order system as affected by dissolutions of partnerships, bankruptcies, insolvencies, &c.; the constant attempts to prostitute the mails to the perpetration of frauds; the shrewd and well-laid schemes by sharpers and ringsters to defraud the Department, render the duties of the officer arduous and difficult, and devolve upon him a higher degree of responsibility than that which attaches to any other law officer of the Government, the Attorney-General alone excepted.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

A. A. FREEMAN,
Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for a vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to assent to this amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HANNA. I move to amend by striking out the following clause at the end of the pending paragraph:

And so much of section 349 of the Revised Statutes as provides for the appointment and payment of a salary to a "naval solicitor" is hereby repealed, and the office is abolished.

I am somewhat at a loss to imagine any reason why this attack should be made upon the Navy Department. I call attention to section 349 of the Revised Statutes:

There shall be in the Department of Justice a Solicitor of the Treasury, an assistant Solicitor of the Treasury, a Solicitor of Internal Revenue, a naval solicitor, &c.

Now, why one of the most important Departments of the Government should be stripped of a legal adviser is beyond my comprehension. It has been my fortune to serve during this Congress upon the Committee on Naval Affairs; and being a lawyer, cases involving legal questions to some extent have been referred to me. I feel justified, therefore, in saying that if there be a Department connected with the Government that requires the aid and counsel of a sound and learned lawyer the Navy Department is such a one. What reason can be stated for abolishing this office? Do you wish to leave that Department at the mercy of those who through it may have designs upon the Government? Do you wish to take from that Department the shield of counsel, in so far as the advice of gentlemen learned in the law may be a shield? Why is this? Have you provided for detailing any assistant attorney-general who shall specially have charge of matters connected with that Department? I do not find it in this bill. I do not know myself who to-day is the solicitor of the Navy. He is no pet of mine. But I know enough to know that that Department ought to have the advice, counsel, and assistance of an attorney, if any Department connected with the Government ought to have it, and until I hear some good reason why this officer should be stricken down, why that Department should be deprived of the assistance of a solicitor, I shall move to strike it out.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall briefly state the reasons why the committee came to the conclusion to do so. In the first place this officer was created in 1862, and I believe the law creating the office provided it should not continue longer than one year after the war. I believe that is the law. The design in the creation of this office was that it was to be a temporary one. It was designed not to be a permanent one. In accordance with that idea and that legislation it has been left out of several of the appropriation bills. There has been a fight for years on this floor to keep that officer in.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is no good reason why this officer should not be dispensed with. It seems to me the Department of Justice is sufficient, with four assistants, already to discharge all of the duties incumbent upon that Department, including all the questions which may arise in our naval service. I see no very great amount of business which could possibly arise there, as the Navy is constantly declining.

We are in a time of peace—not at war—at peace with all the world and at peace among ourselves, and I see no reason why all the legal business which may occur or arise in the proceedings of the Navy may not be passed upon and the laws interpreted by the Department of Justice with the Attorney-General and his four assistants. This Department of Justice itself has grown up largely since the war. Before the war it was not near so expanded a Department as it is now.

Again, the gentleman speaks of designs upon the Treasury, if I understand him correctly, and that we ought to have this office for that purpose.

Mr. HANNA. I say if you wish properly to guard the Treasury why then attempt to strike out the position of solicitor of the Navy Department?

Mr. ATKINS. It seems to me the head of the Department of Justice ought to be a sufficient guard for not only the Navy but for every other Department of this Government so far as infractions of the law are concerned or interpretations of the law.

Mr. HANNA. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. It is not so much the new business requiring the attention of an attorney as it is to guard the Government against the payment of improper claims which arose during the war.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman propose to say that the Department of Justice as organized to-day exclusive of this officer is not competent to discharge that duty? Does he intend to cast any reflection on the ability or efficiency of the Department of Justice?

Mr. HANNA. Not at all.

Mr. ATKINS. Surely not. Then why is not this within their scope and power? Are they not competent to discharge all these duties? It seems to me that it is simply to keep a man in office, that is the whole of it.

I know nothing about the incumbent. He is a gentleman so far as I know. I scarcely know his name. I did not know his name until yesterday. I do not cast any reflection upon his fairness or anything connected with him in any way. I fall back upon the ground that there ought not to be a division of responsibility in this matter. The responsibility ought to rest upon one man. It ought not to be divided among subordinates. As this gentleman stands, according to the argument of the gentleman, he is particularly charged with matters concerning the Navy. I say that responsibility ought not to be divided between the Department of Justice and any subordinates. There have been grave questions arising in this Navy Department. There have been recently large contracts, amounting to millions of dollars, made by the Navy Department—not under this Administration, but at the close of the last Administration.

Mr. HANNA. And they were promptly canceled.

Mr. ATKINS. Contracts were entered into contrary to the law—outside of the law—not authorized by existing statutes. I say the responsibility of such grave questions ought not to be given to any subordinates. They ought to be placed in the hands and under the control of the Department of Justice. That Department ought to be responsible for them and for other questions of law arising in the other Departments.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. And I desire to get the attention of the learned chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I am not in favor of increasing expenditures and it will be seen I have not moved in that direction. I want to ask him and the House whether I understand that hereafter the Attorney-General is to have two assistants.

Mr. ATKINS. He has three.

Mr. BUTLER. Who are they?

Mr. ATKINS. The bill provides for three, as amended.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to know what these three assistants have to do. One is before the Court of Claims all the time. We had a solicitor of claims before the war. Another has to be preparing Supreme Court cases all the time. Another has to be examining the questions which are put from the several Departments to the Attorney-General and preparing cases which are to be dealt with all over the country. Where does the Department get a force to do any more?

We come to the naval solicitor. There is one matter which the learned chairman has not taken into consideration. The naval solicitor is also judge-advocate-general of the Navy and tries all court-martial cases on behalf of the Government. Before the war attorneys were employed. Lawyers were nominated and appointed by the Secretary of the Navy for that purpose. Fees were much larger than salaries.

The naval solicitor has to examine the court-martial cases. In the Army you have got a judge-advocate-general, with five assistants, if I remember rightly—five or six assistants. Why cut off from the Navy one man only, who has to do all the naval business? I do not say whether the present incumbent of the office is the best man or the worst. That has nothing to do with this. I think him a man of very great experience. He has thirteen years' experience and was a prominent lawyer before he went there. But if he is not a good man, get another. We may lay the man out of sight.

Now I want the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that I think his zeal brought him for the first time into a somewhat unfair argument on this question, and that is, putting the naval contracts upon the naval solicitor who has nothing to do in making them at all.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that I did not make any such remark as that. I said where such important contracts are being let the Attorney-General should revise them, and not a subordinate officer.

Mr. BUTLER. Ah! The Attorney-General has not to decide about contracts except to know if they are legal in form, and if the Solicitor of the Treasury wants to make one that is not legal he will not send it to the Attorney-General. I supposed my friend, when he spoke of these contracts, mentioned the Navy solicitor. The naval solicitor is not in any way responsible.

But there ought to be a solicitor of the Navy Department. The naval officers, of all men on earth, have the least acquaintance with law and legal proceedings.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER. I will avail myself of the courtesy of my colleague to add a sentence or two. Of all the people in the world, officers in the Navy have the least acquaintance with legal proceedings, and they have to do with great questions of international law. They need advice from home and they need advice after they get home. All that is referred to the naval solicitor, and it would be a great saving to this Government, in my judgment, to have that office continued.

I agree before the war there was no naval solicitor, so called, but there were a dozed naval solicitors employed and paid for, and if my friend will go and examine the accounts of the Navy Department before the war he will find it was a measure of economy to appoint a naval solicitor, and I do not see why that office should be stricken down. Why not strike that down in the War Department? There you would save eight or ten times as much. I am not in favor of striking that down. I only wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it is proposed here to take away from those who have to deal with questions of international law all over the world their opportunity of receiving legal advice. You say send those questions to the Department of Justice. Well, you cut that down and the Department of Justice cannot grapple with all the questions in the world.

Mr. ATKINS. We have not cut that down.

Mr. BUTLER. Many of those questions have to be decided on the spot. More than that, if you strike out this man you will pay next year four dollars for one, for gentlemen learned in the law as judge-advocates for court-martials in the Navy and for somebody to deal with the revising of the decisions to see if they are legal. Therefore, if this were a motion to strike out the officer I should oppose it as not being in the interest of economy.

Now deal with the office, gentlemen, deal with the necessity for such an officer; do not deal with the man. And do not raise a cry that the Navy is the most corrupt of all corrupt institutions. I do not want that discussed now. When the report of the learned chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs comes in, he and I will give such views to the House upon that as may seem to us just and proper; but now I am on the question of a lawyer for the Navy Department and no other.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I very heartily support the recommendation made by the committee; and in giving my reasons for it I beg to state that I favor that kind of economy which shall abolish useless and unnecessary officers rather than contract the salaries.

Now, of what earthly use is the naval solicitor to the Navy Department? He is not, I will say to my learned friend from Massachusetts, the judge-advocate for the court-martials distributed throughout the country. He is nothing but a simple reviewing officer of the court-martials of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. I have known him try cases before court-martials in San Francisco, in Boston, and in New York, and I do not know in what other places; but I know that much of my own personal knowledge.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The other places the gentleman does not know are the most familiar places; that is to say, that officer is occupied at those other places rather than at Boston, San Francisco, and New York.

Now, during the whole period of time that I have been connected with the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House I have seen but little of the labor of this officer, and what little I have seen is not such as to commend to my judgment the office or the officer. It has been stated, Mr. Chairman, that this officer was necessary, first, for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of court-martials and, second, for the purpose of reviewing contracts. Now, may I appeal to the sympathy and respect which I know my friend from Massachusetts has for the last administration of the Navy Department if not its present administration, and ask him to remember when that distinguished officer of the Government came to consult upon a legal question he did not consult the naval solicitor but the Attorney-General, Mr. Taft, and sought his opinion and his advice?

That may be to the credit of the present solicitor, but I appeal to the gentleman if it is not his experience and I ask every member of the House if it is not his experience that the so-called assistant solicitors in the Departments are but a mere convenience to those Departments when they want favorable opinions upon jobs or something of that kind.

Sir, in the distribution of the powers of the Government you have created, independent of the Treasury Department, the Navy Department, the War Department, or the other Departments, a judicial office. It is that Department, so to speak, that directs the legal mind of the Executive and controls the legal discretion of the Executive. It is an office known to the law; it is an office to be consulted by the Executive in all its branches; it was an outgrowth of the war.

When these offices of solicitors of the different Departments were made they were supposed to be necessary on account of the accumulation of business in the various Departments. That has passed away, and there is less business done in the Navy Department now than was done before the war. There are no more contracts there or court-martials there now than there were prior to the war, but there is the same amount of expenditure there, and it has a much greater amount now than was expended prior to the war.

The Department got along then without this office. It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that private individuals were employed to do this service. I submit that we have not escaped that thing even when we have a solicitor in office, and we cannot get away from that practice until we put the pruning-knife in at some other point than this. For one I deem it an unnecessary and useless office, a mere sinecure, and I am glad my friends on the Committee on Appropriations are abolishing these unnecessary offices.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I renew the amendment. I desire to ask the Committee on Appropriations if they have not in their possession letters or communications from the Attorney-General and from the Secretary of the Navy, both protesting that this office should not be abolished and assigning the reasons why the office should be continued.

Mr. ATKINS. Oh, yes; we have got letters upon all subjects.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I expect, then, before this debate closes, some of the reasons which are assigned by the Attorney-General to the Secretary of the Navy for the continuation of this office will be laid before the House.

In my experience as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, more than once long and exhaustive opinions of this officer have been sent to the committee for their examination, and I believe I may say that in all those cases the opinions manifested much labor, much study, and undoubted ability.

When I was at the Navy Department, a few weeks since, the Secretary of the Navy had lying upon his table the minutes of a naval court-martial, covering over one hundred pages of manuscript, and he said to me that it was impossible for him as Secretary of the Navy to investigate carefully and thoroughly such a mass of papers as that in order to render a just opinion upon the case; that without the aid of a solicitor of the Navy the work could not be properly done in his Department. Now, these things occur daily. I do not think any gentleman will rise in his place on this floor and say that the naval solicitor is not employed profitably to the Government every day in the year. Look at the contracts, involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. The very form requires some one of legal skill and ability. Shall the Secretary of the Navy be required to send to the Attorney-General for all the ordinary legal matters in his Department? Why not give him an accomplished officer at his elbow whose attention he can command at any moment?

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I will hear it.

Mr. DURHAM. Is it not true that clerks draw up all of these contracts?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I know of no clerk in the Navy Department who is competent to pass on a contract when it is drawn or to dictate a contract covering hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Now when remarks are made about the responsibility of the solicitor of the Navy for contracts it seems to me out of place. He only draws up the agreements and contracts which the Secretary of the Navy has determined upon, and it is certainly important that the contract, whatever it may be, should be drawn up by a competent legal officer or at least supervised or dictated by him. It must be seen that he performs very important duties, and when the Secretary of the Navy deems the services of such an officer almost indispensable to his Department I hope the office will not be abolished while the facts concerning it which came from the Departments are kept from the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] that I sent to the committee-room for the letters and have no objection to their being read; I do not desire to suppress anything. I hope the gentleman will retract his insinuation, for I have no desire to keep anything from the House.

Mr. HANNA. But a few words in addition to what I have already said. Even if the Secretary of the Navy or the Attorney-General himself had not said to the House or to the Committee on Appropriations that a solicitor for the Navy Department was necessary, if the Secretary of the Navy was to come here and say that he could get along without such an officer, as a lawyer, from my knowledge of that Department, so far as it has come under my observation in the committee-room in the investigation of contracts and claims, I undertake to say that in the interest of economy that Department ought to have a special officer, an attorney for the Department.

And I want to make one further suggestion. As members of Congress we are forced to stand up here to-day and make the humiliating confession that we are practically without a Navy, and in the next five years we of necessity must commence to build a Navy. That involves the making of contracts. Now there is no lawyer upon this floor who does not know full well that there will be a saving to the Government of thousands of dollars in having those contracts subjected to the scrutinizing eyes and judgment of a competent lawyer. Even in that regard you would save more than would pay the $3,500 salary of this officer.

Mr. ATKINS. Why not subject the contracts to the inspection of the Attorney-General himself or to some one he may designate?

Mr. HANNA. My friend from Massachusetts has already advised the House as to the duty of this special officer. And you and I know that there are to-day more cases pending before the Supreme Court of the United States in which the United States is interested and more cases in course of preparation to go into that court than any one man can attend to. Then why talk to me in this way, when you and I as lawyers know that fact?

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] talks about clerks writing contracts. It is to avoid those gimlet-hole savings and bung-hole wastings that I say it is necessary to have a competent lawyer to attend to these things. It is in the interest of economy to have it. And now of all other times in the history of this country is it necessary to have a competent lawyer to supervise the contracts of the Navy Department. There can be no question as to that. Talk to me of a mere clerk writing a contract involving millions of dollars! I say again contracts of that character ought to be subjected to the scrutiny of the best legal minds of the country. By existing law you pay the solicitor of the internal revenue $5,000 a year. Will gentlemen tell me that the Department of Internal Revenue is more important than the Navy Department, a Department upon which we may sooner or later be compelled to rely for the defense of our flag? I say, then, away with that kind of economy, because it is a bung-hole wasting process, of which we have had enough.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DURHAM. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] like myself always speaks very earnestly, more especially where a Cabinet officer living in his own State is concerned. The gentleman speaks of my saying the clerks in the Navy Department write and draw contracts. Now I put the question to the gentleman, if he does not know that they do it?

Mr. HANNA. A clerk in the Department?

Mr. DURHAM. You profess to be familiar with the process of business in that Department. I put the question to you whether or not the clerks in the Department do not draw contracts?

Mr. HANNA. When the gentleman asks me whether a clerk draws a contract for the building of ships, and his judgment is the judgment of the Navy Department, I tell him "no."

Mr. DURHAM. That is not answering my question. I knew I would drive the gentleman into his hole before I was done with him. He cannot deny the interrogatory I put to him. I will ask him another question, as he professes to be so very familiar with this matter; if in all the investigations of these contracts which have taken place during the past year the present solicitor of the Navy Department has ever overlooked one of them?

Mr. HANNA. Although I do not know the present solicitor and do not care about him personally, I have examined document after document and contract after contract written by him.

Mr. DURHAM. That is all very true; but you have not answered my question,

Mr. HANNA. What is the question?

Mr. DURHAM. I am authorized to say that the records of that investigation will show that not one single one of these contracts was ever subjected to the supervision of the solicitor of the Navy Department.

Mr. HANNA. Oh, when you talk——

Mr. DURHAM. Hold on; it is my turn now. You were talking about the importance of this officer. When these five millions of spurious contracts were foisted upon the country your naval solicitor never supervised one of them. And you call that a bung-hole operation.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not to his credit that he never supervised one of them?

Mr. DURHAM. Ay; and perhaps if he had done so these five millions of spurious contracts never would have been foisted upon the Government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. DURHAM. Wait a moment; not to be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It must be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. DURHAM. Then I cannot yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DURHAM. My time is not out and I want to say a word further. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] talks as if there were no other legal mind in the country than the solicitor of the Navy Department. Why, sir, where is the Attorney-General with all his force? Why cannot he supervise matters of this sort? I will say to the credit of the present head of that Department that I would rather have his supervision of these matters than that of the naval solicitor. I think it probable that when we get at the very bottom facts of this matter we shall find that when these things are looked into by the clerks or other subordinates and briefs made out by them the head of that Department together with the Attorney-General is competent to supervise them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman ever known a contract which the present solicitor of the Navy Department supervised which has been defective in form or in any way at fault?

Mr. DURHAM. I presume the trouble is that he has not made the supervision.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask whether any contract drawn or supervised by him has proved faulty or defective?

Mr. DURHAM. I do not know. I put the question to you gentlemen on the Naval Committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I want an answer. I desire to know whether this solicitor in discharging his duties has not done so faithfully and according to law?

Mr. DURHAM. What was he doing if he did not supervise these contracts? You say that it is his duty; and yet it is admitted that of all these contracts, involving $5,000,000, your present naval solicitor never supervised one.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Was any one of those contracts illegal? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The pro forma amendment being withdrawn, the question recurred on the amendment of Mr. HANNA; which was not agreed to, there being—ayes 58, noes 92.

The Clerk read as follows:

For law and miscellaneous books for office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, $500.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For law and miscellaneous books for office of Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, $500.

Mr. DURHAM. I raise the point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. DURHAM. It is that there is no law authorizing this expenditure. The amendment proposes to enact a new provision of law for the purpose of creating a library.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I will ask my friend whether there is any law authorizing a library for the Attorney-General of the United States?

Mr. DURHAM. There is.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. This officer is an assistant of the Attorney-General; his office is in the Post-Office Department; he is there without any library. The question is whether he shall have one or not.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair time will be saved by waiving the point of order and submitting the amendment to the House.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I have a letter from the Postmaster-General in which he says that this appropriation ought to be made. Now, I appeal to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to grant this library to this assistant of the Postmaster-General. He ought to do it because the Postmaster-General asks it. The Post-Office Department is the only Department that our side has in this Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATKINS. Heaven save the mark.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. We have a great many able republicans in our State; but the President was kind enough to select for this Cabinet position one of our best democrats. I think we ought to treat him with some degree of liberality. He asks this House to give him the miserable pittance of $500 for a library for his Assistant Attorney-General, a man who has to decide a thousand very important cases every year. I hope that the Committee on Appropriations will withdraw their objection and let this little appropriation be made for the benefit of this democratic branch of the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. If the Navy Department does not want any law, why does the Post-Office Department want any library, except for the reason that the solicitor comes from Tennessee? [Laughter.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of the four floors of the building occupied by the Department of Justice, $14,000.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to amend by striking out "$14,000" and inserting "$8,000." I do not know whether or not the Committee on Appropriations have investigated this matter; but I am a member of a committee that has had it under consideration and I am of opinion that $14,000 for rent is certainly most exorbitant. No individual engaged in any sort of private business in the city of Washington would give half this rent for the building. It was offered a short time ago for sale and the highest price offered for it was about $125,000. The Department of Justice occupies only the four upper floors, the basement and first floor being used for other purposes. Eight thousand dollars for the part of the building used by the Government is an ample rent, more I believe than it is actually worth and more than it could be rented for to be used for any other purpose. Abuses of this sort have existed long enough and ought to be corrected at once. I see no reason why the Government should pay more rent than private individuals would have to pay for the same property. I therefore ask my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to accept the amendment I offer. We had as well commence a needed reform now.

Mr. ATKINS. In reply to my colleague [Mr. YOUNG] I will say that I think the rents paid by the Government are very high; and the Committee on Appropriations have done their very best to cut them down, but it has been almost a matter of impossibility. The building occupied by the Department of Justice belongs to the Freedman's Bank. There has been a proposition to sell it to the Government. That proposition was submitted to the committee of which my colleague [Mr. YOUNG] is a member and the gentleman from Georgia, I believe, chairman. They declined to recommend its purchase. Our committee considered it. We turned it over to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There are various estimates placed on the building. I will say that it is very likely, as this building belongs to the Freedman's Bank and belongs to the freedmen—it is very likely, I say, that the committee rather yielded a large rent on that account.

Mr. HAYES. Is there any contract for any length of time?

Mr. ATKINS. Only for a year at a time.

Mr. HAYES. I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment; I think it is abundant. I feel that we are paying an exorbitant rent.

Mr. ATKINS. I think my colleague is cutting down too low.

Mr. YOUNG. I put it $2,000 more than I thought it was worth when I put it at $8,000.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to put it at $6,000; that is a sufficient rent for four floors in this building, which are all that are used by the Government.

Mr. YOUNG. And they are the upper floors.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes, sir; upper floors. I suggest that $6,000 ought to be ample and sufficient rent for their use. There is no reason in the world why the rent should be more than that. Private individuals certainly would not pay a cent more rent than that.

Mr. ATKINS. I must say to my colleague that I believe he is too radical in his reduction. It is cutting down the rent too low for so large and commodious a building when it is proposed to cut it down to $8,000 a year.

Mr. YOUNG. I think $8,000 is a very high rent for this building.

Mr. ATKINS. Make it $10,000. I do not think the gentleman should insist upon his amendment in view of the facts I have stated. As the building belongs to the freedmen I do not think we ought to insist on requiring them to accept a smaller rental.

Mr. YOUNG. One word in reply to my colleague. I think from the former management of that institution it is a matter of grave doubt whether the amount of rent paid by the Government will increase the fund which will go for the benefit of the freedmen.

Mr. ATKINS. If honestly administered it will.

Mr. LATHROP. I wish to ask a question. Is it not a fact that this $14,000 covers the heating, lighting, and care of the building?

Mr. ATKINS. Nothing but the rent.

Mr. LATHROP. Does it not cover the warming of the building as well?

Mr. ATKINS. I hope my colleague will consent to make his amendment $10,000.

Mr. YOUNG. If I do it will be against my judgment.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague accepts my suggestion.

Mr. BANNING. How much is this building worth? I understand it is only worth $75,000.

Mr. DURHAM. There are various estimates from $150,000 to $250,000.

Mr. BANNING. If it is worth even $100,000, $6,000 is a very good investment of the money.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. How much could the building be put up for now?

Mr. DURHAM. Colonel Casey made an estimate of some $169,000.

Mr. FINLEY. That is what it cost?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANNING. We use only four rooms of the building.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe my colleague consents to make it $10,000.

Mr. YOUNG. I do that in deference to my colleague's judgment and not my own.

Mr. FINLEY. I insist on my amendment to reduce the rent to $6,000.

The question recurred on Mr. FINLEY's amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes, 96.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANNING. I move to make it $7,000.

Mr. WILSON. No; make it $8,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. It used to be $17,000.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. That was three times more than it was worth.

Mr. BANNING. I should like to say a word about my amendment. This whole building is worth only from $75,000 to $100,000. If, however, it is worth $150,000, $8,000 is certainly a large rent for these upper floors. The Government does not occupy the lower portion of the building at all. Six thousand dollars is as much rent as the Government ought to pay for the floors it occupies. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FOSTER. The contract price for the rent of these rooms has been $17,000.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. It was entirely too much.

Mr. FOSTER. It was cut down under the leadership of the gentleman from Pennsylvania two years ago, and it is creditable to his head and heart and the heads and hearts of the gentlemen comprising the committee now that they allow the poor people owning this building a reasonable compensation for its use.

Mr. BANNING. May I ask the gentleman a question? I would like to ask my colleague if, in his opinion, $8,000 is not a good compensation in these times for the use of these rooms?

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir; I think not. The building and grounds are worth probably $200,000 or $225,000—somewhere thereabout. The building and grounds were once estimated at a good deal more. The estimate given by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] was for the building only. The ground is very valuable in that neighborhood.

Mr. BANNING. Does the gentleman believe the building and ground would sell to-day for $150,000?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know anything about that. But I wish to say, and I rose for the purpose of saying, that this building is owned by very poor people——

Mr. FINLEY. Who are they?

Mr. FOSTER. The depositors in the Freedmen's Bank.

Mr. FINLEY. Who have charge of it?

Mr. FOSTER. It is in charge of a commission or trustees for their benefit. The concern is bankrupt. The property belongs to these poor people who were depositors in the Freedmen's Bank; and it is creditable to the head and heart of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and it would be creditable to this House to agree to the proposition to pay a liberal rent instead of haggling over the question whether $8,000 or $10,000 is a sufficient sum.

Mr. BANNING. Does the gentleman believe the freedmen will ever get one dollar of this? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote."]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. There is already an amendment pending to the amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$8,000."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 54, noes 100.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG. I move now to amend by inserting $9,000, in order to have an opportunity to say a word to the House in explanation of my course in reference to this matter.

I am perhaps just as anxious that the freedmen should have all that justly belongs to them as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] or any other gentleman in this House; and if I was assured that the money would be honestly and fairly appropriated to the discharge of the debt due them, I would most willingly join the gentleman from Ohio in any lawful effort to provide a fund for that purpose.

If the payment of this extravagant rent is intended as an act of national munificence to the defrauded freedmen on the part of this Government, why, let gentlemen say so and then I may act with them. If the Government owes the freedmen anything, I am willing to vote every dollar necessary to discharge the indebtedness. If it is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] and of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to do a humane and charitable act for the freedmen, I will most heartily and cheerfully co-operate with them. But I know of no reason why this Government should make an appropriation to pay the losses sustained by the failure of the Freedmen's Bank more than for any other bank that may have failed. It is no more sacred, as far as I am aware, than any other claim of similar character.

If the gentleman from Ohio will submit the proposition fairly and distinctly for this Government to reimburse these unfortunate people all they have been robbed of, and show me any legal warrant for such action, I will support the proposition as heartily and as cheerfully as he will. But if that is not the purpose; if it is the purpose alone to fix a fair and just compensation for the rent of this property, I suggest to my friend from Ohio that it would be better and more creditable to argue it from a different stand-point.

If the object of the Committee on Appropriations is to determine what is a fair rent for this building, I beg to say that the amendment I first offered, in my judgment, and in the judgment of many men competent to determine that question with whom I have consulted, provides an ample rent for all that part of the building occupied by the Government. If I were to consent to a greater sum I should do so in deference to the judgment of my colleague, [Mr. ATKINS,] and not because I believe it is worth it.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] remarked that he saw no reason why the Government should pay this debt to these people. I propose to tell him why they should pay it. Through my district circular after circular was sent to these ignorant people telling them that if they would deposit their little earnings which they had acquired by hard labor in the Freedman's Bank the security would be as good as the Government itself; that the Government was bound for it. Under these promises they made the deposits; the sewing-women, the boys that earn nickels by blacking boots, all the freedmen in all parts of my district put their little savings in this bank in the belief that they would be held sacredly for them by the Government.

The money was lost; and I say the Government is bound in honor if not in law to make it good to these people. Much has been said about the repudiation by Mississippi of the Union Bank bonds in times past. The constitution of Mississippi prohibited any debt being contracted except by two successive Legislatures; and when a debt was contracted by white men who loaned money to the Union Bank under a law professing to bind the State, but passed by only one Legislature and therefore not authorized by the constitution, that State was denounced because she would not pay that debt. I say this Government is more a repudiator to these freedmen than Mississippi was in reference to those who loaned their money to the Union Bank of Mississippi when it was not loaned under authority of law.

The proper course to have been adopted, in my judgment, was that the Committee on Appropriations should have recommended the appropriation of money enough to pay for that building precisely the sum which it cost these people when they put their money into it, and I introduced a bill for that purpose. That much, at least, the Government should do as an act of justice and good faith to men made citizens by their act, men who had no education, men who trusted the Government, men who believed the declaration made by a man wearing a blue coat was as sacred as that of the Government itself. They trusted the Government and the Government should respond to their trust.

On this point I quote the testimony of Anson M. Sperry, who has been in the continuous service of the bank since its organization in various capacities, among others as its inspector from 1871 to 1874, a most intelligent and, in my judgment, reliable witness:

> Question. Do you know whether at Vicksburgh or any other branch the inducement was held out to depositors to deposit in that bank because it was a Government institution?
> Answer. I think it was.
> Q. That inducement was made to induce persons to deposit; that it was a Government institution and that the Government was bound to the depositors?
> A. Yes; I cannot say specially at Vicksburgh, though I think that that foolish policy was adopted there.
> Q. Did they not represent that the deposits made by individuals would be guaranteed by the Government of the United States?
> A. I think they did, but I will qualify my answer by saying that I am not certain as to Vicksburgh; though I think so. But of this I am certain, that you will find on many of the pass-books of the New York branch these words, in English, French, and German: "The Government of the United States has made this bank perfectly safe."
> Q. You say that that will be found on many of the pass-books?
> A. Yes. I wanted to raise this question before the committee because it is important, and it relates to the history of the institution. I do not think our more judicious cashiers ever adopted that phrase.

True, the "more judicious cashiers" never did adopt that phrase, but a little pamphlet was prepared containing the charter and by-laws of the bank and distributed among the freedmen, which contained this statement:

> The whole institution is under the charter of Congress, and received the commendation and countenance of the President, Abraham Lincoln. One of the last official acts of his valued life was the signing of the bill which gave legal existence to the bank.

It needed only a reference to the martyr-President who had signed the act of emancipation to inspire the utmost confidence. Everything that the wits of these people, sharpened by the whettings of their infernal avarice, could suggest was resorted to for the purpose of drawing money from the freedmen's pockets. The "Christian soldier," General Howard, was then loud in his professions of love for the negroes, and his certificate was sent out as follows:

> I consider the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company to be greatly needed by the colored people and have welcomed it as an auxiliary to the Freedman's Bureau.
> O. O. HOWARD,
> Major-General.

The colored people were entreated to practice industry and frugality. It was a matter of importance to put these appeals in a form that would attract and carry conviction to their uneducated minds, and hence this rhyme, the poetry of which is no better than the morality of its authors:

> 'Tis little by little the bee fills her cell;
> And little by little a man sinks a well;
> 'Tis little by little a bird builds her nest;
> By littles a forest in verdure is drest;
> 'Tis little by little great volumes are made;
> By littles a mountain or levels are made;
> 'Tis little by little an ocean is filled;
> And little by little a city we build;
> 'Tis little by little an ant gets her store;
> Every little we add to a little makes more;
> Step by step we walk miles, and we sew stitch by stitch;
> Word by word we read books, cent by cent we grow rich.

It turns out that these lessons of industry and frugality were taught to the negroes so that the managers of the bank at Washington might live in laziness and luxury on the proceeds of their labor and "grow rich" upon the "cent by cent" saved by the self-denial of the freedmen.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" and "Go on!"] I only want to talk about two minutes. [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" and "Let him be heard!"]

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the House will hear my colleague; he rarely speaks, and when he does he always speaks to the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] to occupy the floor for two minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG. I should make no reply to the gentleman from Mississippi if his remarks were not calculated to place me in a false attitude before the House. I am willing to give him all the credit he is entitled to or deserves for his admirable stump speech, but do not want him to have it at my expense. I give him full credit for his philanthropic interest in the well-being of the freedmen. I know that it is entirely disinterested and springs from pure goodness of heart, being in no way influenced by the fact that he has in his district a majority of 8,000 colored voters. [Laughter.] As another evidence of the unselfish motives which prompted his eloquent declamation I may mention the fact that there are not a dozen men in his district who ever had a dollar in the Freedman's Bank. [Laughter.] So he can have no concern about any losses his constituents may have sustained.

His district adjoins my own, and is only a little way below it on the river, and if any of his constituents ever deposited any money in the Freedman's Bank such deposit would have been made in the branch of that institution located in the city of Memphis where I live; but I took occasion a few days since to examine the books of that branch and did not find that a single one of his constituents had ever had a dollar in it. So all he manages to get out of it for them will be a clear gain. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHALMERS. I know that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] thinks that the sun rises and sets in Memphis, and that there is no other place on the face of God's green earth where the freedman could have deposited their money. But let me tell him that there are some banks in Mississippi, and that the ten per cent. now due on freedmen's deposits in the banks at Vicksburgh and Natchez alone amount to over $10,000.

The gentleman says that my constituents are poor, and that they do not own any money, and that I have a large majority of colored people in my district. I never heard it before asserted in the American Congress that it was a disgrace to a man to be poor. [Laughter.] I admit that I represent a majority of colored population; but, sir, I have made democrats of them, and they sent me here to represent them, and I intend to represent them honestly, fairly, and fully, whether they are rich or poor. My colored constituents, sir, are poor but honest men. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ATKINS. I hope we shall have a vote now.

The question was put upon the amendment to strike out $14,000 and to insert $7,000, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. YOUNG, to strike out $14,000 and to insert $10,000; so that it would read:

For rent of the four floors of the building occupied by the Department of Justice, $10,000.

The question was put; and upon a division there were ayes 122, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I give notice that I shall ask a vote upon that amendment in the House.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Court of Claims:

For salaries of five judges of the Court of Claims, at $4,500 each; chief clerk, $3,000; one assistant clerk, $2,000; bailiff, $1,500; and messenger thereof; in all $29,840.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

After line 1920 insert the following:

And it is hereby provided that in apportioning appointments as provided for in the "Act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, the apportionment shall be so made that the clerical force in each Department shall be made equal among the several States and Territories, according to population, and hereafter no such appointment shall be made from any State or Territory which is in excess until an equal distribution of said force is secured.

Mr. FOSTER. That is new legislation and is not in the interest of economy. I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Is the amendment pending now?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made upon the amendment by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the amendment is held to be in order, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I ask the Clerk to read from the law of 1875 the part which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after January 1, 1876, the appointments of this Department shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the Union, the Territories, and the District of Columbia according to the population.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. The only remark I have to make is that my amendment is in accordance with existing law; it is merely explanatory of the law as it now stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The old law applies only to one Department; the amendment of the gentleman, as the Chair understands it, applies to all the Departments.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. That is so.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair that would be a change of existing law. The Chair therefore rules that the point of order is well taken, and the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk read the following:

For stationery, books, fuel, labor, postage, and other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, $2,000; for reporting the decisions of the court, clerical hire, labor in preparing and superintending the printing of the twelfth volume of the reports of the Court of Claims, to be paid on the order of the court, $1,000; in all, $3,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the word "twelfth," before the word "volume," and inserting the word "thirteenth." It is merely a verbal correction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 7, line 150, of the bill, where I think an amendment is necessary. I move to strike out the words "during the session," after the words "and one page," in the paragraph relating to the force of the office of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I have also another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the committee; that is, the compensation of the librarian of the Patent Office. The Committee of the Whole raised the compensation to $1,800; the Committee on Appropriations have consented to increase it to $2,000. I therefore move, in line 1527 of the bill, to change the salary of the librarian of the Patent Office from $1,800 to $2,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to recur to the paragraph in relation to the Department of the Interior. I move an amendment providing a clerk in the office of the Assistant Attorney-General of the Interior Department. I am assured by the officers of the Interior Department that such a clerk is absolutely necessary. I therefore move to insert in line 1413 the words "one law clerk in the office of the Assistant Attorney-General of the Interior Department, $2,250."

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now ask that the committee recur to page 37 to a paragraph and pending amendment which were passed over the other day by agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the United States mints and assay offices, namely: For specimens of coins, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $200; for books, balances, and weights, and other incidental expenses, $800. And refining and parting of bullion shall be carried on at the mints of the United States and at the assay office at New York. And it shall be lawful to apply the moneys arising from charges collected from depositors for these operations pursuant to law so far as may be necessary to the defraying in full of the expenses thereof, including labor, materials, and waatage; but no part of the moneys otherwise appropriated for the support of the mints and the assay office at New York shall be used to defray the expenses of refining and parting bullion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment; which was to add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to constitute any superintendent or assayer of any mint or assay office an assistant treasurer of the United States to receive gold coin and bullion on deposit for the purposes provided for in section 254 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that there should be a modification of the amendment so as to provide that such assayer or superintendent so appointed shall not receive any other or additional compensation.

Mr. ATKINS. I think that is a very good suggestion.

Mr. PAGE. Was not the point of order made on this amendment?

Mr. VANCE. There was no point of order made upon it, but I believe some gentleman on that side reserved the right to make it. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] stated distinctly that he did make the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I do not make any point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I move also to amend by inserting the words "and silver" between the words "gold" and "coin."

Mr. FOSTER. I raise a point of order on the whole amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Is it not too late to do that?

Mr. FOSTER. The right was reserved to make a point of order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] cannot make a point of order on the entire amendment, because it has been under consideration, a motion to amend has been made, and it is certainly too late for him to make the point of order now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio could not ascertain whether a point would lie until the amendment was read.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The amendment was read, and an amendment moved to it and agreed to, and a further amendment was offered.

Mr. FOSTER. An amendment was suggested.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not been amended at all.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It was amended by inserting the words "without additional compensation."

The CHAIRMAN. That was merely a modification of the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. When the amendment was first read I asked the Chair if it was subject to a point of order, and the Chair said it was. I stated to the Chair that I declined to make any point of order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And the amendment was read, and an amendment moved and adopted, and then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] offered an additional amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. VANCE. I moved an amendment and there was no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] moved the amendment the other day, and then the paragraph and pending amendment was passed over; and the right to make a point of order upon the amendment was expressly reserved. After the amendment was reported by the Clerk to-day a modification was suggested to it.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. When the amendment as modified was read, then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] made a point of order upon the entire amendment, which in the opinion of the Chair was in time.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I beg pardon of the Chair for one moment. After the amendment as modified was read, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] moved to insert the words, "and silver."

Mr. FOSTER. And I was on my feet at the time to make the point of order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think the point of order is too late.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt the gentleman from Ohio has the right to make the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the Chair will decide the question one way or the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order upon the ground that the amendment proposes to change existing law.

Mr. ATKINS. Very good; then debate on that point is no longer in order. I call for a vote.

Mr. VANCE. Has the Chair decided the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been decided. The amendment is not before the committee.

Mr. VANCE. I desired to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has already been decided.

Mr. ATKINS. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the point of order lies against the whole amendment—the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order certainly lies against the whole amendment, because it proposes to create an office not provided for by existing law. Certainly every gentleman in the House must know that on this ground the amendment is liable to the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order in regard to the matter of silver, and I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order has been decided and that it covers both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order applied to the whole amendment as modified.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make an explanation in regard to this paragraph, which I am certain not half a dozen members on the floor understand, and probably did not when the amendment was made to a similar bill two years ago. There is an appropriation here——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] asks unanimous consent to make an explanation. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has now been read through——

Mr. HANNA. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further amendments are offered the Chair will recognize the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I make that motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it for a moment, that I may make an explanation. I move to strike out the last word. I want to say in justification of the Secretary of the Treasury—[cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]—I will do it if you will allow me——

Mr. BUTLER. But we do not allow you.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to make an explanation. I move to amend the last paragraph by striking out the last word. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] had been recognized, and was proceeding to make some remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. He asked unanimous consent, and objection was made.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] moved that the committee rise, pending which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] asked permission to make a statement. My point is that such permission cannot be given unless the gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ATKINS. I did yield.

Mr. FOSTER. All I desire to say is this: during the discussion the other day on the reorganization——

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. FOSTER. I believe I am entitled to a respectful hearing.

Mr. BREWER. I rise to a question of order. The Chair announced that the bill had been read through; and I submit it is not now competent for us to go back.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is to the last paragraph.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. My point of order is this: the bill was finished in committee, the last paragraph was passed upon; then by unanimous consent we went back to another paragraph. Now the last paragraph is beyond amendment. If it is not, then the whole paragraph is open to amendment, and we can all speak five minutes as well as the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the last part of the paragraph we went back to that I moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. BUTLER. When we went back to page 7 everything was finished.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask my colleague on the committee whether he desires to be heard.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want more than one minute.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the House will hear the gentleman from Ohio. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. If the House will not hear the gentleman, then I move the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House. [Cries of "Regular order!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CONGER. If any gentleman here wishes to make an amendment to this bill it cannot be taken out of committee and reported to the House; the rules forbid it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Ohio has the right to offer an amendment to the last paragraph.

Mr. DURHAM. I hope the House will hear the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. All I desire to say is that during the discussion here a day or two ago on the reorganization of the Auditor's Office I made a statement that it was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. At the time I thought he did originally approve of the change. I since have learned from him that he did not, and I wish to give him as well as myself the benefit of the correction. [Cries of "Vote!" Vote!"] I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. McCOOK. I wish to give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote in the House on the amendment to line 1790, which provides for the distribution of seeds and plants and all that sort of thing under the head of Agricultural Department. It is a trifling thing, but I want to see how many people in the House will go on record on that subject.

Mr. ATKINS's motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. ATKINS rose.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask to offer an amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. BURCHARD. How can the gentleman admit anything?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee in charge of the bill does not demand the previous question; therefore the bill is open to amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Do I lose control of the floor by yielding for an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not lose control of the bill by yielding.

Mr. ATKINS. If I do, then I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to read from the Manual:

> After a bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, it is in order to submit additional amendments; but the first question put is on the amendments reported by the committee.

The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee to desire to admit an amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.] The Chair, after such amendment is offered, would then recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to move the previous question, and, if seconded and the main question ordered, the question would be first on the committee's amendments and then on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana. If the amendment makes an appropriation of money it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, both under Rule 110 and Rule 112.

Mr. GIBSON. This exact amendment has had its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole already.

Mr. FINLEY. But was defeated.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for the reading of my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Strike out from lines 966 to 974 and insert in lieu thereof the following:
> Mint at New Orleans:
> For salary of the superintendent, $3,500; for the assayer, melter, refiner, and coiner, four in all, $2,500 each; cashier, $2,000; chief clerk, $2,000; weigh clerk, deposit clerk, and book-keeper, at $1,600; assayers' clerk, $1,600; in all, $23,900.
> For wages of workmen and adjusters, $57,000.
> For fuel, fluxes, light, lead, copper, acids, chemicals, crucibles, and for incidental and contingent expenses, $30,000.
> For repairs and machinery, $75,000.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. That involves not only a change in existing law, but in addition to that a very large increase in the appropriation of money. I submit that it is not competent to consider it in the House and that it is not in the interest of economy.

The SPEAKER. The point of order that the amendment changes existing law is one point. That it makes an appropriation which requires its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole is another point.

Mr. FINLEY. That same amendment was considered in the Committee of the Whole, and, as I recollect, it was defeated.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. It was defeated by a very large vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the point of order that all appropriations of money must have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole, as provided in Rules 110 and 112, does not weigh against the amendment, for the reason that this very amendment, the Chair understands, has already been considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. And defeated.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. And now it comes in as an original proposition.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is also the point that it is new legislation.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the identical proposition has been submitted to the Committee of the Whole and defeated there, I understand the ruling of the Chair would be that it would be in order to offer it in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that having been considered in Committee of the Whole it escapes the restrictions imposed by Rules 110 and 112. But the question whether it changes existing law is another matter.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to inquire how the Speaker knows that this proposition was considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker reads.

Mr. FINLEY. It does not appear in the Journal, and the fact is not reported by the committee.

Mr. GIBSON. The question whether or not this is new legislation, was passed upon in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] states that this is the same amendment as that which he submitted in the Committee of the Whole. It was discussed and voted on in Committee of the Whole. Therefore the Chair decides that the rule which requires an appropriation of money first to be considered in Committee of the Whole does not weigh against this amendment, for the reason that it has in fact been considered there. And the Chair will state that the principle of the restrictions requiring consideration in Committee of the Whole are imposed because there is more latitude as it were, and there is not a record in Committee of the Whole, but this does not weigh with the same force against an amendment in the House where there is an opportunity of a yea and nay vote being given.

Mr. THOMPSON. What is the decision of the Chair on the other question—the question of this being a change of law? The ruling of the Chair only applies to the point that this amendment makes an appropriation of money, not to the point that it is new legislation.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. How can the Chair determine whether this was the identical proposition submitted in Committee of the Whole when the Committee of the Whole keeps no record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has to take the member's word for that. The gentleman from Louisiana has asserted that it is the exact proposition. Does the gentleman from Indiana deny it?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I am not able to do that.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the House do now adjourn. Let us take this up to-morrow. We have done enough to-day. I think I have earned my per diem.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that the House take a recess.

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to modify my motion so that it shall be a motion for a recess.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] on the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to demand the previous question if he makes such motion.

Mr. BUTLER. He has yielded the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The mere demand for the previous question does not prevent a motion to adjourn or to take a recess.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that this evening has been assigned for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. MILLS. I am aware of that. Still a majority of the House can adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I hope the House will not adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MILLS, there were—ayes 62, noes 80.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. I understand the order assigning the business for this evening was for the reception of reports on pension bills and acting upon pension bills on the Calendar as on objection day.

The SPEAKER. Yes; as on objection day.

Mr. BUTLER. There cannot be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Of course there may be a call of the House, if the House was without a quorum and orders it.

The question being taken on Mr. CLYMER'S motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Speaker decided whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided on the one point that the amendment contains an appropriation; that, being the identical proposition which has already been considered in Committee of the Whole, it does not come within the range of Rules 110 and 112, which require the first considerations of all appropriations in Committee of the Whole. And the Chair desires to state that decisions have been made heretofore in the House that where the subject-matter even was discussed in the Committee of the Whole an amendment embracing that subject-matter was in order in the House; but the Chair does not so decide now. The Chair only decides that the identical amendment word for word having been offered and discussed and voted upon in the Committee of the Whole, if the gentleman from Tennessee yields the floor for such purpose it is competent for the gentleman from Louisiana to offer that amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. What about the second point?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided yet on the second point.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It may just as well be decided in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs Rule 120 to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

120. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—September 14, 1837—unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.—March 13, 1838, and January 17, 1876.

The SPEAKER. Before deciding that point the Chair would like, first, to learn exactly the fact whether it does change existing law; and, second, to examine carefully whether it comes within the terms of the rule or not.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. There is a misapprehension as to what the business for this evening is. It is thought by some that this matter will come up. I wish the Speaker to explain that it will not.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move the previous question on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would inquire of the Chair whether the ordering of the main question does not dispose of the point of order?

The SPEAKER. It will not, because the Chair reserves such point for examination, with consent.

Mr. CONGER. The session to-night, it is understood, is only for the consideration of what may be called private pension bills, and not general pension bills.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent this evening session was fixed for private pension bills only. Pension bills general in character are public bills and are not upon the Private Calendar. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] will occupy the chair this evening as Speaker pro tempore.

The question was put upon Mr. CRITTENDEN'S motion, and it was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion for a recess leave of absence was granted to the following:

To Mr. MONEY, for two weeks on, account of serious illness in his family; and

To Mr. HARDENBERGH, for four days.

FREE SHIPPING.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4679) to encourage free shipping and to relieve American industries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY BY THE RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of certain property transferred by the Russian government at the time of the purchase of the Territory of Alaska, and recommending certain legislation in reference thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HENRY W. MARTIN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the military history of Henry W. Martin, late a private in Company B, Twelfth Michigan Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

F. N. HURTT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers in the court-martial case of F. N. Hurtt, assistant quartermaster, United States Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is hardly fair.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that the vote has been taken upon the motion to take a recess.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, it has not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was taken, and the Chair before announcing the recess laid certain matters before the House. With this announcement the Chair hopes that the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I want to say as a question of fact no vote was taken, for the negative side was never called for.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that quite a number of gentlemen on the floor differ with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to that view.

Mr. THOMPSON. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House again.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore.. The session this evening is exclusively for the consideration of reports from the Pension Committees and pension bills on the Private Calendar, as on objection day.

Mr. JOYCE. As there are so few present I move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House took a recess for ten minutes.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was again called to order by Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore.

DALTON HINCHMAN.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3266) granting a pension to Dalton Hinchman, late a private Company G, Second Regiment Michigan Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT P. WALKER.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 4680) granting a pension to Robert P. Walker, late a private Company H, Ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH ODELL.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 4681) granting a pension to Joseph Odell, late a private Company I, Sixty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported back the following bills, and the committee was discharged from their further consideration, and the same were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows;"

A bill (H. R. No. 4651) for the relief of Nancy Fleanor, widow of Nicholas Fleanor, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4267) for the relief of Elizabeth Chance, widow of Eli Chance, to indemnify her for loss incurred by the rejection of her claim for a pension under the act of February 14, 1871.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I have here several Senate pension bills which I have been instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report with a favorable recommendation. It was the order of the committee when these bills were reported to the House to have them placed on their passage at once; and if it is in order I will ask that that be now done. There is a report in each case, which can be read if members desire it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that the Senate has taken any particular pains to forward action on House pension bills which have been sent over there.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I do not know that they have.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) They have adjourned from Thursday to Monday, leaving the pension bills to take their chance.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Well, I will ask that the House now proceed to consider these Senate pension bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that would hardly be in accordance with the understanding in regard to the order of business for this evening's session.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Allow me to say that that is the order in which we have usually acted upon objection day. When Senate bills have been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it has been the custom to act upon them at once. In accordance with that custom I asked that that course be followed in the case of these Senate pension bills.

Mr. BROWNE. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. RICE, of Ohio] that we had better now proceed to consider bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that the order of business for this evening's session is as much for reports from the Pension Committee as it is for the consideration of pension bills on the Calendar. The order of business is first reports from the committee, and these Senate bills are now reported from our committee.

Mr. BROWNE. I have noticed in the course of proceedings in this Congress that a very large number of these pension bills have passed the House and gone to the Senate, and there they have slept the sleep of death. Now, if I could do so, if it were parliamentary to do so, I would suspend action on the pension bills from the Senate, keep them here unacted upon, and notify that body that unless they gave some attention to the bills of the House the bills of the Senate would not be considered by us.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I would ask my friend if because the Senate does wrong the House should do so. Some of these bills have been before our committee from four to six weeks, and have been fully and thoroughly considered by the committee.

Mr. BROWNE. I will answer the gentleman. It certainly is no reason that because the Senate has done wrong the House should do so; but we certainly should hold these bills for the purpose of compelling the Senate to do right.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. If there is any objection, I will ask that these Senate bills be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and then if we have time, after considering the House bills on the Calendar, we can proceed with the consideration of the Senate bills.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I hope the gentleman will not do that; it will be punishing these pensioners instead of punishing the Senate. As these bills have passed the committee——

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. They have been fully considered by the Pension Committee of the House.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman let me make a statement? I have had in my charge the case of a young man who in 1863, in an attempt to expel Morgan from the State, lost his right arm. Four times that bill has been passed by this House, and as often has it failed to pass in the Senate.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I would vote him a pension in a minute.

Mr. BROWNE. I have no doubt of it. If the chairman thinks it best, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Other gentlemen here appear to think that these Senate bills had better go to the Calendar.

Bills of the following titles, reported by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with a favorable recommendation, were accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 871) granting a pension to William Emerson;

A bill (S. No. 712) granting a pension to William Loudon;

A bill (S. No. 76) granting a pension to Mary Ann McFarland;

A bill (S. No. 221) granting a pension to Mary Kirby Smith Eaton; and

A bill (S. No. 535) granting an increase of pension to Theodore Gardner.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Ohio, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 872) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann W. Steele; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

PENSION BILLS FAVORABLY REPORTED.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, bills of the following titles; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

A bill (H. R. No. 3925) granting a pension to James H. Hayes, private in Company B, Thirty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

He also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2076, a bill (H. R. No. 4682) granting a pension to Adaline P. Loy, widow of Joseph F. Loy, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 2975) granting a pension to William Reynolds, late a private in Company G, Thirteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported bills of the following titles; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4683) granting a pension to Michael O'Brien; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4684) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine Vaughan, widow of Thomas J. Vaughan, late a private in Company H, Third Tennessee Mounted Infantry.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 686) granting a pension to Mary Emma Baptist and Daisy Baptist, minor children; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JACOB PARROTT.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] was instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to make favorable reports in certain cases, and by his request I report them to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will send his reports up.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 2944) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Parrott, of Hardin County, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM N. TANNAHILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4685) granting a pension to William N. Tannahill; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JEPTHA RUBERT.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1636) granting a pension to Jeptha Rubert; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM Q. BAXTER.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4686) granting a pension to William Q. Baxter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by request of Mr. POWERS, submitted the following adverse reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 3745) granting arrears of pension to Gordon B. Barnes;

A petition for arrears of pension to George Wolf, late surgeon in Company C, Fifth Regiment Maryland Volunteers;

A petition asking for pension for Robert B. Boggs;

A bill (H. R. No. 755) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Jane Pyle;

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. RAINEY also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following bills; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 693) granting a pension to Henry Fishburn, private in Company A, Twenty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2679) for the relief of Anna M. Meixwell;

A bill (H. R. No. 620) for the relief of Byron S. Morris;

A bill (H. R. No. 103) granting a pension to William S. Fonda; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2306) granting a pension to Milley Anderson, widow of David Anderson, a soldier of the late civil war.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. RAINEY, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the papers in the case of the legal representatives of French Graham; and the same were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CATHARINE GEMMILL AND CHILDREN.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4702) granting a pension to Catharine Gemmill and children; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM GIBSON.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1443) granting a pension to William Gibson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY S. WEBSTER.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3397) granting a pension to Mary S. Webster; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WEALTHY PERKINS.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4703) granting a pension to Wealthy Perkins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE LAWRENCE.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3411) granting a pension to George Lawrence; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. As I believe all the reports have now been made, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. FORT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The session of the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to-night is for the consideration of pension bills upon the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will read the first bill of that character upon the Calendar.

The Clerk read the title of the following bill, on page 16 of the Calendar:

A bill (H. R. No. 3852) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late James Monroe, lieutenant-colonel Virginia State Line, war of the Revolution, and President of the United States.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. My recollection is that this bill and other bills from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were not included in the order for this evening's session. This bill is reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. It may be that it was an inadvertence, but I think the order for the session to-night was for reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Private Calendar is to be considered to-night as on objection day.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. It is, and the first bill to be taken up is a bill from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which is House bill No. 1956, on page 16 of the Calendar.

Mr. TURNER. Let it be first settled whether we are to consider any but reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. If we are to consider reports from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, then the bill the title of which has been read by the Clerk is the first for consideration. What are the terms of the order that was made for this evening's session? I understood that it was to embrace all private pension bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that the session this evening was for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TURNER. Then the first bill is the one from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions the title of which has just been read.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There is a bill on page 9 of the Calendar, House bill No. 3575, granting an increase of pension to Josephine Da C. Thomas.

The CHAIRMAN. That bill was objected to on a former day.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I made the objection, and I now withdraw it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That bill was reported favorably from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. When it came up for consideration I was absent, and through inadvertence my friend from Alabama [Mr HEWITT] objected to it. He now withdraws his objection, and I ask that the bill be now considered.

Mr. BURCHARD. It seems to me that it would not be in order to go back to a bill which has been objected to.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. It has not been objected to to-day, and if there are not five objections to it now it can be considered.

Mr. BURCHARD. The only question is, whether at a former session of the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar this bill was objected to, and, if so, whether it would be in order or proper to-night to go back to it. It might be that the member who objected to the bill would not be here to-night, understanding that the bill had been objected to. I myself have no objection to the bill.

Mr. SINNICKSON. Would we not have to go back to the bill to see if there are five objections to it?

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I will read the latter part of Rule 129:

But when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.

Now, I hold that the meaning of that rule is that unless five members shall to-night object to this bill it will be in order for us to consider it as of objection day.

Mr. MAYHAM. This bill has not been "again reached," in the language of the rule. When we shall have gone through the Calendar, then we can come back to the bills which have been objected to, and they will then be "again reached."

Mr. BURCHARD. The question now is, where shall the Committee of the Whole commence on this Private Calendar? It certainly cannot be in order to begin upon a bill which has already been objected to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Allow me to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the Committee of the Whole to-night must begin upon the Calendar where the Committee of the Whole left off on the previous objection day.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I do not know but that the Chair is correct in that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will therefore read the first pension bill, to which no objection has been made.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I propose to withdraw my objection to the bill to which reference has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that under the rule the Calendar must be resumed where it was left off on the last objection day. The Clerk will therefore report the first pension bill to which no objection has been made.

The Clerk again read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3852) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late James Monroe, lieutenant-colonel Virginia State Line, war of the Revolution, and President of the United States; reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. MACKEY.

Mr. RIDDLE. This bill is evidently not a pension bill, but a claim bill, to give to the legal representatives of President Monroe certain half pay.

Mr. McGOWAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the Speaker to state explicitly at the close of the session this afternoon that the session this evening was simply for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. TURNER. The record is "pension bills," and that embraces bills from both pension committees. There are but two or three of these bills from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and they are for old men, who need relief the most.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the order for a session this evening was for the consideration of pension bills upon the Private Calendar, as of objection day.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I will object to the bill the title of which has just been read, and that will dispose of that one.

The bill being objected to, it was passed over.

JARVIS JACKSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2961) for the relief of Jarvis Jackson, of Laurel County, Kentucky, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MACKEY. The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior, from and after the date of the passage of this act, to pay to Jarvis Jackson, of Laurel County, Kentucky, a pension of $16 per month, instead of $8, which he is now receiving.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ROBERT QUINN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4359) granting a pension to Robert Quinn, of Preble County, Ohio, a soldier of the war of 1812, reported by Mr. MACKEY from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Quinn, a soldier of the war of 1812, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. EDEN. As we have a general law allowing pensions in cases of this kind, I would like to hear the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Quinn, of Preble County, Ohio, praying for a pension for military services performed during the war of 1812, after careful consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner alleges in his application for pension that on or about the 15th day of April, 1813, James Quinn, a brother, was drafted in Lieutenant James Black's Company of Ohio militia, to serve for a period of six months; that the said James Quinn went out with the company, but after a short time was sent home with a sick comrade, and John Quinn, another brother, took his place. After he had served about thirty days he returned home on furlough, and that on or about the 7th day of August, 1813, the petitioner went out and served in the place of his said brother, James Quinn, for about the period of ninety days; and that a few days before the expiration of the term of enlistment the said brother, James Quinn, returned, assumed his place in the ranks, and was discharged with the company.

In support of the above allegations are the affidavits of Jacob Ringer and John Quinn, who served with and intimately knew the claimant. They certify under oath to the length of service.

It is also in evidence that the claimant received a land warrant for said services for one hundred and sixty acres of land, and that on or about the 15th day of April, 1871, he made application to be placed on the pension-roll of the United States, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 14, 1871, granting pensions to survivors of the war of 1812 and their widows; and that the same was rejected by the Pension Office, under the rule of the department which forbids the acceptance of parol evidence to controvert the record of the proper department.

The records of the Pension Office fail to show that a pension has ever been granted to any one of the parties or their widows for the said military service, but does show that the widow of James Quinn received a bounty-land warrant.

The petitioner alleges the death of both brothers, James and John Quinn.

It is the opinion of the committee, after examining all the evidence in the case, that the application comes within the spirit of the act approved March 11, 1878, and that the claimant is entitled to relief. They therefore report favorably upon the same, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ISAAC WINANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4360) granting a pension to Isaac Winans, reported by Mr. MACKEY from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac Winans, of Ohio, a private soldier in the war of 1812.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ABIGAIL S. TILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1970) granting a pension to Abigail S. Tilton, reported by Mr. MACKEY from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. EDEN. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1970) granting a pension to Abigail S. Tilton, beg leave to submit the following report:

It is in evidence that the husband of the petitioner, Benjamin Stevens, was a soldier in the revolutionary war, and was mustered into service on the 18th day of July, 1777, serving as a private in Captain Samuel McConnell's company, of Colonel Thomas Stickney's regiment, of the brigade commanded by General Stark, and was honorably discharged on the 18th day of September, 1777.

It is also in evidence that at the date of the petitioner's marriage with the said Benjamin Stevens she was the widow of David Tilton, and was married to said

Stevens on the 31st day of January, 1831, and that they lived together until his death, which occurred on the 25th day of August, 1832; that she subsequently married Adoniram Paige, who died in 1848; that by special act of the New Hampshire Legislature, approved January 4, 1849, she was permitted to take the name of Abigail S. Tilton, and in which name she now petitions Congress for relief.

It is in evidence, by letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, that by the act of Congress approved February 3, 1853, she was entitled to have her name placed upon the pension-rolls at any time prior to June 22, 1874, at which date the aforesaid law was repealed.

It is also in evidence that since the death of her third husband, Adoniram Paige, she has lived with and been supported by Nathaniel D. Tilton, the son of her first husband, until about one year since, when he died, by which event she is now left childless and destitute; that she is now over eighty-six years of age, and in receipt of no means whatever to furnish food or clothing or medical attendance and nursing in her last years of life. In consideration of which, and in accordance with the spirit of the act approved March 11, 1878, granting pensions to widows of revolutionary soldiers, the committee return the bill to the House and recommend the granting of the pension, and that the date of commencement of the same shall be June 22, 1874, the date of repeal of the act allowing pensions to revolutionary soldiers and their widows.

Mr. EDEN. I do not wish to object to a bill which has been reported favorably, but certainly it is very strange that the committee should report in favor of a pension to this lady, who has been twice married since the death of the husband who rendered the military service.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I object to the bill because the general rule to which, so far as I know, all our pension bills conform, is that the pension shall commence from the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. CONGER. The bill could be amended in that respect.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. If it can be amended, I will move to amend so as to provide that the pension shall begin from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object to the bill on the ground that it proposes to pension a widow who has married twice since the death of her husband, the soldier who rendered the service.

Mr. CONGER. One marriage might be an objection; but the second ought to neutralize it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

MARY J. SEARS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the petition of Mary J. Sears, praying for a pension, reported adversely by Mr. MACKEY from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I object to the consideration of this case. There is an adverse report.

FRANKLIN PAINE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1641) granting a pension to Franklin Paine, reported by Mr. GARDNER from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Franklin Paine.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the report in this case.

The report was read.

Mr. EDEN. I object to this bill. I see no reason why this man cannot obtain a pension under the general law.

INVALID PENSION BILLS FAVORABLY CONSIDERED.

Bills of the following titles, to which no objection was made, were laid aside to be reported favorably to the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Thomas Murphy, of Knox County, Missouri; reported by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions;

A bill (H. R. No. 629) granting a pension to Thomas W. Hewitt; reported by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the same committee; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4361) granting a pension to Elizabeth Winters; reported by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the same committee.

ELIZABETH R. HULL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Hull, reported by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the same committee.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

CYNTHIA A. MIZELLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4362) granting a pension to Cynthia A. Mizelle, reported by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cynthia A. Mizelle, mother of Zedekiah M. Mizelle, late a private Company C, First Regiment North Carolina Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. SAMPSON. I believe that the reports in all these cases ought to be read.

Mr. CONGER. If the chairman or any member of the committee will state whether the report is unanimous or not, we ought to be willing to take his word in the matter.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Or a brief sketch of the facts might be given. If all these reports are to be read, we shall never get through.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. In some of these cases where the bill is reported unanimously, some member of the Committee of the Whole objects. Therefore it seems to me the safest course is to have the reports read.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. As to most of these reports the gentlemen who made them are here. Wherever the report is made by myself I can state in two or three words the merits of the case and whether the report was unanimous or was objected to in committee.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition praying for a pension to Cynthia A. Mizelle, dependent mother of Zedekiah M. Mizelle, late private in Company C, First Regiment North Carolina Volunteers, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to submit the following report:

The committee find, from the evidence on file, that the soldier was in the service of the United States, as is alleged; that he died while in said service, on or about April 20, 1864, of disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty; that the mother, outside the proceeds of her own labor, was almost entirely dependent upon her said son for support; that he supported her before he entered the service, and contributed afterward, while in the service as much toward her support as their relative situations would permit, he being in the Federal Army and she inside the confederate lines; that the soldier left neither a widow nor children, and that the mother of said soldier was dependent upon him for support, within the meaning of section 4707 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The committee therefore report back said petition with the accompanying bill, and recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. McGOWAN. What is the necessity for a special act in this case? Why could not a pension be allowed by the Department?

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. The mother of this soldier was within the confederate lines. He belonged to one of the North Carolina Federal regiments during the late war, and communication between him and his mother was cut off, so that it could not be shown positively to the Department that he aided in her support; but there is no question about the facts in the case.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LEVI J. FRIEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4363) granting a pension to Levi J. Friel, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RICE, of Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill and report will be read.

Mr. JOYCE. Let me make a remark. Every one of these bills is referred to a member of the committee, that member goes over the papers, considers the papers carefully and makes report; that report is made to full committee, the report is read to the full committee, the facts are all discussed, the case is talked over and settled by the whole committee, and there is a vote in every case.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. By way of explanation let me say that every member is responsible for his own action and in order to form a correct judgment in reference to these cases it seems to me necessary the facts in each case should be read. I ask, therefore, that the report in each case may be read, so we may see the reasons why the pensions should be granted.

Mr. JOYCE. I have no objection to the report being read, but the reason I made the statement was in order that the gentlemen of the committee may know exactly how these cases were disposed of by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If all these reports are to be read there will be a great many soldiers who ought to have pensions who will never get them.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I should be very sorry to prevent the passage of a just pension bill, but it is very necessary that we should guard against the passage of bills which are not just and proper.

Mr. SAMPSON. Having suggested that the reports in each case be read, and having heard the explanation from the committee, I for one intend to rest on the report of the committee.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. There is no doubt this case is right.

There was no objection; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BILLS FAVORABLY REPORTED.

There being no objection in the following cases, they were laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that they do pass:

A bill (H. R. No. 4364) granting a pension to Lydia A. Morris, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RICE, of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3166) granting a pension to Agatha O'Brien, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 1778) granting a pension to William Abendroth, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 2321) granting a pension to Andrew A. Gooding, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 44) granting additional pension to John F. Chase, of Saybrook, Connecticut, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 4365) granting an increase of pension to Mary F. McKeever, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 4366) granting a pension to Mary Wilkes, widow of Rear-Admiral Charles Wilkes, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 3103) for the relief of Oliver Yake, of Sanilac County, Michigan, reported from the same committee by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 848) for the relief of Francis B. McNamara, reported from the same committee by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 530) granting a pension to James W. Thompson, reported from the same committee by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 79) granting a pension to Robert Butler, reported from the same committee by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 4367) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah A. Bell, reported from the same committee by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (S. No. 328) granting a pension to Mrs. Esther A. George, reported from the same committee by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 735) granting a pension to James H. Thew, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 3070) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza Bayard Anderson, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 2791) granting additional pension to Mrs. Margaret J. Lovell, widow of the late General Charles L. Lovell, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 767) granting a pension to Otis B. Anderson, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 1043) granting a pension to William H. Walker, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 475) granting a pension to William Black, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4368) granting a pension to Johanna Kuhlman, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4369) granting an increase of pension to General James Shields, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. WALSH.

Mr. WALSH. We have passed the Senate bill granting this increase of pension with amendment. I ask that this bill be passed over.

The bill was passed over.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4370) granting a pension to Catharine Harris.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Let that bill lie over. The committee were not unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HAYES. Is there objection to this bill granting a pension to Mrs. Harris? I understood the gentleman from Ohio simply to say that the committee were not unanimous.

Mr. WALSH. Let the report be read. There are many cases in which the committee are not unanimous. I do not think a bill should be passed over on that account.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. To save time I object to this bill. The report in this case is a very long one.

Subsequently, Mr. RICE, of Ohio, withdrew the objection.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The following bills were read, and no objection being made, they were laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 4371) granting a pension to Ludwig Ueber, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 4372) granting a pension to Mary Meighan, widow of Peter Meighan, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 4373) granting a pension to Mary J. Lebow, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (S. No. 724) granting a pension to Nancy E. McClelland, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH; and

A bill (S. No. 755) granting a pension to Martha C. Kendall, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3351) granting a pension to John Reagel, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RIDDLE.

The bill was reported with the following amendments:

Strike out "John Reagel" and insert "John Keogel."

Strike out "September, 1847," and insert "the passage of this act,"

The amendments were adopted.

No objection being made, the bill, as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The following bills, not being objected to, were laid aside to be reported favorably to the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 1627) granting a pension to Jacob M. Groce, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 473) granting a pension to Rebecca C. Reich, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 2623) granting a pension to Nelson M. Farrar, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4075) granting a pension to Ezra O. Nye, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 2936) granting a pension to George R. Whitehead, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 3817) granting a pension to Annie Farley, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4574) granting a pension to Sarah J. Goss, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4375) granting a pension to Frederick R. Bruner, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4376) granting a pension to James G. Williams, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4377) granting a pension to William Cogswell, reported from the same committee by Mr. RIDDLE.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 707) granting a pension to Martin Roff, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions adversely by Mr. RIDDLE.

Objected to by Mr. RICE, of Ohio.

The following bills, not being objected to, were laid aside to be reported favorably to the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 4378) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irving, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (H. R. No. 4379) granting a pension to Mary Bradley Cross, reported from the same committee by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (H. R. No. 4380) granting a pension to Aaron H. Miller, reported from the same committee by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (H. R. No. 4381) granting a pension to Edward J. Nutall, reported from the same committee by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (H. R. No. 4382) granting a pension to Jonathan Roberts, reported from the same committee by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (H. R. No. 4383) granting a pension to Stephen L. George, reported from the same committee by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (S. No. 703) granting a pension to Melvina A. Maltby, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 3585) granting a pension to S. S. Whitney, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 642) granting a pension to Frederick W. Smith, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 3583) granting a pension to William Denene, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 2226) granting a pension to Charles H. Bugbee, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 3784) for the relief of Mary Murphy, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 2520) granting a pension to George Andrews, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 134) for the relief of Jacob G. Croman, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS;

A bill (H. R. No. 4384) granting a pension to Daniel Donnelly, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3438) granting a pension to R. G. Peterson, reported from the same committee by Mr. POWERS.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4294) to increase the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth S. Roberts, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. JOYCE.

The bill was reported with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out "$50" and insert "$30 from the passage of this act."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, no objection being made, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The following bills, no objection being made, were laid aside to be reported favorably to the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 4385) granting an increase of pension to Caroline Hawley, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. JOYCE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4386) granting a pension to Emilie R. Hooe, reported from the same committee by Mr. JOYCE;

A bill (H. R. No. 2172) granting a pension to De Forest Doty, reported from the same committee by Mr. JOYCE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4387) granting a pension to James C. Bates, reported from the same committee by Mr. JOYCE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4388) granting a pension to Mary Wade, reported from the same committee by Mr. JOYCE;

A bill (S. No. 697) granting a pension to Anna E. Robbins, reported from the same committee by Mr. JOYCE;

A bill (H. R. No. 147) granting a pension to Captain Robert C. Bramford, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RAINEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 477) granting a pension to Anna Koeninger, reported from the same committee by Mr. RAINEY; and

A bill (H. R. No. 480) granting a pension to William W. Stephenson, reported from the same committee by Mr. RAINEY.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 270) for the relief of the widow of Captain Christopher M. Haile, United States Army, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RAINEY, with an amendment.

The amendment was to strike out the words "day of his death" and insert "20th day of September, 1871, the day of filing her application."

Mr. BOUCK. I object, unless it is made to date from the passage of the act as in other cases.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask that the report may be read. It will be seen that this is a peculiar case.

Mr. BOUCK. It is unnecessary to read the report.

Subsequently, Mr. BOUCK withdrew the objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, no further objection being made, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The following bills, to which no objection was made, were laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation:

A bill (H. R. No. 4389) granting an increase of pension to Jerry Robinson, late commissary-sergeant First Regiment United States Colored Troops, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RAINEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 4390) granting a pension to William B. Dillon, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RAINEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 4391) granting a pension to Susan Humes, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RAINEY;

A bill (S. No. 873) granting a pension to Hannah Streets, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RAINEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 4392) for the relief of Lucinda C. Dillahanty, of Tennessee, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. STEELE;

A bill (H. R. No. 511) granting a pension to George W. Wright, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. STEELE;

A bill (H. R. No. 1348) to restore the name of Jesse Stallings, of Butler County, Alabama, to the pension-list, reported from the same committee by Mr. STEELE;

A bill (H. R. No. 247) to grant a pension to George D. Phillips, reported from the same committee by Mr. STEELE;

A bill (H. R. No. 4393) granting a pension to Mrs. Sidney A. Harrison, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. NORCROSS;

A bill (S. No. 285) granting a pension to Elizabeth D. Stone, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. SINNICKSON;

A bill (H. R. No. 1616) granting a pension to William Blancett, of Patrick County, Virginia, a soldier of the war of 1812, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 705) granting a pension to Laura Seamen, the widow of Elricy Seaman, a soldier in the war of 1812, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. KIMMEL;

A bill (H. R. No. 471) granting a pension to Martha J. Robinson, widow of James H. Robinson, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RICE, of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 636) granting a pension to Oliver H. Irons, late sergeant Company D, Twenty-third Michigan Volunteers, reported from the same committee by Mr. RICE, of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 4421) granting a pension to August Mellon, reported from the same committee by Mr. RICE, of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3440) granting a pension to George Fritz, First Regiment United States Dragoons, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 2289) granting a pension to Mrs. Maria L. Maxwell, widow of William C. Maxwell, Company D, Twelfth Ohio Volunteers, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 1959) granting a pension to John Haley, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 3605) restoring the name of Marcellus Wilson, of the Regiment of Mounted Riflemen, in the Mexican war, to the pension-roll, reported from the same committee by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 3059) granting a pension to Jacob F. Ruth, late a private in Company I, Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery Volunteers, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 4423) granting a pension to the minor heirs of William S. Price, deceased, reported from the same committee by Mr. WALSH;

A bill (H. R. No. 734) granting a pension to Syvert A. Anderson, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MACKEY;

A bill (H. R. No. 2351) granting a pension to Henry W. Higley, of Lena, Illinois, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. SINNICKSON; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4424) granting a pension to Derrick F. Hamlink, reported from the same committee by Mr. SINNICKSON.

The following bills were amended so as to make the pensions commence from the passage of the acts, and were laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation:

A bill (H. R. No. 1946) granting a pension to John McIntyre; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4326) granting a pension to Charles Cline, of Clinton County, Ohio.

MRS. SIDNEY A. HARRISON.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I now ask unanimous consent to go back to the bill (H. R. No. 4393) granting a pension to Mrs. Sidney A. Harrison, that it may be amended so as to conform to the general practice.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Sidney A. Harrison, widow of Thomas Harrison, who was a soldier and military officer in the war of 1812, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month from June 20, A. D. 1876.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I move that the bill be amended by striking out the words "from June 20, 1876," and to insert in lieu thereof "said pension to commence and date from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. NORCROSS. I think if the gentleman from Ohio understood the case he would not move this amendment. The petition in this case prayed that the pension might commence in 1856. The committee have made it commence from the date of the application, and the application was made to the last Congress.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I move the amendment at the request of several members and in conformity with the established rule in such cases.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House favorably.

JOSEPHINE DA C. THOMAS.

Mr. JOYCE. I now ask consent to go back to page 9 of the Calendar for the purpose of taking up the bill (H. R. No. 3575) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Da C. Thomas.

Mr. HUMPHREY. This is the bill which was objected to by mistake by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.] He now withdraws his objection.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN F. CHASE.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. On page 17 of the Calendar is House bill No. 44, granting additional pension to John F. Chase, of Saybrook, Connecticut. That bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. The Committee on Pensions directed that an amendment be moved to that bill, to strike out the words "to commence the 1st day of January, 1875," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. That is correct.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I move that the committee now rise and report the bills to the House which have been acted upon favorably by the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FORT reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the pension bills on that Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendments.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, were then taken up, severally ordered to be engrossed, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2961) for the relief of James Jackson, of Laurel County, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 4393) granting a pension to Mrs. Sidney A. Harrison.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation, were severally taken up, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. No. 328) granting a pension to Mrs. Esther A. George;
A bill (S. No. 724) granting a pension to Nancy E. McClelland;
A bill (S. No. 755) granting a pension to Martha C. Kendall;
A bill (S. No. 703) granting a pension to Melvina A. Maltby;
A bill (S. No. 697) granting a pension to Anna E. Robbins;
A bill (S. No. 873) granting a pension to Hannah Streets; and
A bill (S. No. 285) granting a pension to Elizabeth D. Stone.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the various bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARY WILKES.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. The bill (H. R. No. 4366) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Wilkes, widow of the late Admiral Charles Wilkes, which has been reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, is substantially identical with a Senate bill which has been sent to this House. I ask unanimous consent that the bill of the Senate (S. No. 869) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Wilkes, widow of the late Admiral Charles Wilkes, United States Navy, be taken up and passed.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I now move that the House bill on this subject be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL S. CORL.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2927) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Michael S. Corl; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Pending that motion, I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. McMAHON. The motion is not in order. The business of this evening session was expressly limited to action upon pension bills.

Mr. ITTNER. Less than a quorum cannot adjourn except from day to day.

Mr. VANCE. How does the gentleman know there is not a quorum present?

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the motion to adjourn cannot be entertained this evening under the order of business fixed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The motion of Mr. RICE, of Ohio, that the House adjourn, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BOONE: The petition of Ben. D. Terry, for compensation for services rendered in the Doorkeeper's department, House of Representatives—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. BREWER: Papers relating to the pension claim of Joseph Burt—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of citizens of Cambria County, Pennsylvania, that the credit of the National Government be extended to aid in the completion of the Texas and Pacific Railroad and that the rates for transportation thereon shall forever remain under the direct control of Congress—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. COBB: The petition of citizens of Arizona Territory, that the lands in that Territory heretofore granted the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company be forfeited for conditions broken by said company—to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. DEAN: The petition of Edward F. Decatur, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GIDDINGS: Four petitions of citizens of Nacogdoches, Leon, Henderson, and Anderson Counties, Texas, for the division of that State into two judicial districts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HARDENBERGH: The petition of citizens of New Jersey, against the imposition of an income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. HARMER: The petition of Edward L. Young, for compensation for injuries received while in the service of the United States—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers relating to the pension claim of Elizabeth McCluney—to the same committee.

By Mr. KIDDER: The petition of Acting Assistant Surgeon-General

J. B. Ferguson, for relief from loss of goods by fire at Standing Rock agency, in Dakota Territory—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Yankton, Dakota Territory, asking that a port of entry be established at said city—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. METCALFE: Memorial of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, Missouri, urging the policy of ocean mail service—to the same committee.

By Mr. PEDDIE: The petition of H.W. Jackson, receiver of the Third National Bank of Chicago, Illinois, and others, for the amendment of the laws relating to the tax on banks that become insolvent—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. RICE, of Ohio: The petition of Dr. Wm. J. C. Duhamel, late Acting Assistant Surgeon United States Army, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SAMPSON: Papers relating to the pension claim of Nathan Udell—to the same committee.

By Mr. SAPP: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Wicta, by way of Reno and Carbon, to Quincy, Iowa—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SWANN: Memorial of the Medical Society of Maryland, for the publication of a subject-catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: The petition of 83 citizens of Delaware, for the passage of the proposed law abolishing compulsory pilotage—to the Committee on Commerce.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 4, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I rise to a question in reference to the Journal. The Journal at the proper point states the introduction and pendency of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, but fails to show that any point of order was raised upon it. The inquiry I wish to make is whether it is necessary that the Journal should show that fact?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is still pending.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It is not journalized until finally disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The Journal was then approved.

TESTING OF IRON, STEEL, ETC.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to present a brief petition and ask that it be inserted in the RECORD. It is from an engineer club.

Mr. WOOD. What is the character of it?

Mr. KELLEY. It is from an engineer club asking Congress to continue the appropriation for testing metals for ships, railroads, &c. I do not ask it be read, but merely that it be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BEEBE demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The title of the petition will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Petition of the Engineer Club of the city of Philadelphia, praying Congress to continue the appropriation to the United States board for testing iron, steel, &c.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the petition was received, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The Engineers' Club of the city of Philadelphia, respectfully petition your honorable bodies to continue the appropriation to the United States board for testing iron, steel, &c., and urge in support of such request the following reasons:

First. The object is important. Those conversant with constructive works are aware, in a greater degree perhaps than the general public, of the immense ignorance existing in regard to the strength of materials. All the tables and rules relied on by engineers are based upon experiments made long ago, and made without regard to the chemical composition of the metals. Besides, these tests were made with what may be called miniature pieces of metal, while nothing is more certain than the fact that iron or steel in large masses differs in strength very greatly from the same metal in small test pieces. Moreover, all the published tests from which the rules are deduced were made with foreign materials, no systematic tests of American iron having ever been made, even in the imperfect way above described, except for ordnance purposes. Since then the whole world of constructive mechanics has been revolutionized by the cheapening of steel, which has made this a practical material of construction. Its use has increased enormously for every purpose in the mechanic arts, from ship and boiler plates to bridges, and yet we know almost nothing about the variations in the properties of steel.

Second. The object is national. In a matter of such universal application the whole country is interested. Every one, for instance, travels by land or water, and is concerned in the question of the safety of bridges and boilers. And yet it cannot be expected that private persons or scientific associations should be able, however willing, to expend the considerable sums of money required in a thorough investigation of the kind proposed, nor would the same confidence be placed in results so obtained as would be given to those over which the Government exercises direct control. Unless it is undertaken by the nation for the nation, it will not be done at all, and surely a nation which has always been most liberal toward purely scientific objects, which has spent its hundreds of thousands in geological and astronomical work, will not hesitate to devote a moderate sum to a purpose of such immense importance.

Third. The continuance of the commission is economical. The appointments made have been eminently satisfactory to the public. The commission have gone through enormous preliminary labor and have cleared the ground for effective work. They have directed the construction of a machine, the largest in the world, now almost completed, for the purpose of testing bars of the full size used in actual practice. They are now prepared to work efficiently and rapidly.

If Congress now refuse the appropriation and the commission is dissolved, all this labor will be lost and a new commission would have to go through the whole preliminary work again. Meanwhile the cost to the country, both from the use of unnecessary material in construction and, what is worse, from the losses and accidents caused by the use of too little material, in obedience to the old rules, will, for every day of such delay, amount to more than the total appropriation asked for the commission.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

LEWIS M. HAUPT,
President Engineers' Club of Philadelphia.
CHAS. E. BILLIN,
Secretary and Treasurer.

Special committee:

WM. A. INGHAM,
President R. I. & C. Co.
PERCIVAL ROBERTS, JR.,
Pencoyd Iron Works.
J. SELLERS BANCROFT, of William Sellers & Co.

EXCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COIN.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4704) to retire certain silver coin now in use and to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coin for legal-tender notes under certain circumstances; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed with the accompanying report, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

NATIONAL IRON-MOLDERS' UNION.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 292) to incorporate the National Iron-Molders' Union and put it on its passage at this time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object; it is on the Private Calendar and should stay there.

Mr. BANNING. Who is it objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BANNING. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand that it is not a business corporation, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is it a private bill?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I object.

Mr. BANNING. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I understand this is a charitable and benevolent corporation.

Mr. BANNING. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill is not before the House.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order of business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of yesterday's debate I am made to refer to and to discuss an amendment in reference to the agricultural portion of the legislative appropriation bill, as offered by my colleague Mr. ATKINS, when it should be my colleague Mr. CALDWELL. There are other exceptions I might take to the report, but they are immaterial, and I will not do so.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. What my colleague has said, Mr. Speaker, entitles me, I think, to say a word as a matter of privilege, and I will do so very briefly. While the language of my colleague [Mr. WHITTHORNE] yesterday was equivocal, it was, to say the least, susceptible of a construction unfavorable to me, apparently assuming that I was in some way an enemy to the great agricultural interests of the country. So far as he assumes this he is very much mistaken. I desire to say that, while my friend and colleague who is a most promising and rising man in the State of Tennessee is anxious to cultivate the favor and good-will of the farmers of that State, it is my opinion he cannot convince them he is the proper man for governor by insisting that we shall have prince's-feather, hollyhock, and sunflower seed scattered at the public expense all over the State. I should advise my friend, therefore, to pursue some other course.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Have we not a morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The legislative appropriation bill comes up as the unfinished business on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Can we not have a morning hour after this?

The SPEAKER. Yes; if the House desires it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the regular order of business so I may be heard.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order of business.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded which is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, on which the main question has been ordered. There is a point of order pending against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.] If any gentleman desires to be heard on the point of order the Chair is now willing to listen.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to be heard on the point of order. By the act of the 3d of March, 1835, (4 Statutes at Large, 774,) branch mints were established at New Orleans, Louisiana, at Charlotte, North Carolina, and at Dahlonega, Georgia. Previous to that there had been only one establishment known as the Mint located at Philadelphia. By the second section of the act to which I have called the attention of the honorable Speaker the officers created for the branch mints were one superintendent, whose salary was fixed at $2,500; one treasurer, whose salary was fixed at $2,000; one assayer, with a salary of $2,000; one chief coiner, with a salary of $2,000; one melter, at $2,000; and one refiner, at $2,000.

By the act of February 13, 1837, (5 Statutes at Large, 147,) the officers of this branch mint were reduced by one by the consolidation of the offices of melter and refiner into one, leaving the salaries as they stood before; so that by virtue of the amended act the officers consisted of a superintendent, treasurer, assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner.

By the act of August 6, 1846, (9 Statutes at Large, 65, section 22,) the salary of the treasurer of the branch mint at New Orleans, Louisiana, was increased $500.

The law stood in that condition at the time of the commencement of the war of the rebellion. That is to say, the law then authorized one superintendent, with a salary of $2,500; one treasurer, at a salary of $2,500; one assayer, at $2,000; one melter and refiner, at $2,000; and one coiner, at $2,000. The last appropriation act before the war that was passed in February, 1861, makes provision for this force at those salaries. There was no further appropriation or legislation with reference to the mint at New Orleans until the appropriation act passed on the 20th of July, 1868. By that act the sum of $3,000 was appropriated for the care and supervision of the mint building. On the 3d of March, 1869, the like amount for the like purpose was appropriated. In the years 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873 no appropriation for any purpose connected with the branch mint at New Orleans was made.

That was the condition, Mr. Speaker, of the law with reference to the mint, or branch mint rather, at New Orleans when the act of February 12, 1873, became law. That act is to be found in the seventeenth volume of the Statutes at Large which I hold in my hand. I desire to refer the Speaker to that law.

The SPEAKER. What section?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The first section that I call attention to is section 3, on page 424. The first and second sections of the act provide for placing the mints of the country under the direction of a superintendent of mints located here at Washington. The third section declares:

> That the officers of each mint shall be a superintendent, an assayer, a melter and refiner, and a coiner, and, for the mint at Philadelphia, an engraver, all to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

That section fixes the number of officers of the various mints of the United States. Now, if the Speaker will be kind enough to turn to section 66 of this act, page 435 of the same volume, he will observe that that section provides for the creation of new establishments so far as legal nomenclature is concerned. It drops the designation of "branch mint," which had obtained with all those establishments except Philadelphia, and declares:

> That the different mints and assay offices authorized by this act shall be known as "the mint of the United States at Philadelphia," "the mint of the United States at San Francisco," "the mint of the United States at Carson," "the mint of the United States at Denver," "the United States assay office at New York," and "the United States assay office at Boisé city, Idaho," "the United States assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina."

And the residue of the section transfers and reappropriates any money that may be applicable to the several branch mints at that time existing in the United States to the support and maintenance of the mints thereby created.

The next section, the Speaker will observe, in terms repeals all acts and parts of acts pertaining to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States inconsistent with the provisions of this act. So that by virtue of that act of February 12, 1873, the mint at New Orleans, created on the 3d of March, 1835, with the legal title "the branch mint at New Orleans," was legislated out of existence and ceased to be.

The revisers, however, as the Speaker will observe by turning to section 3495 of the Revised Statutes, undertaking, as is shown by the marginal note on the statute, to recapitulate in these Revised Statutes the mints that had been created by the sixty-sixth section of the act which I have just read, insert by some means, I know not how, the mint at New Orleans in addition to the mints that were expressly created and provided for by the law to which reference is made by the revisers.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to ask him a question? It is whether he does not think that the provisions of the Revised Statutes as passed are binding, even though at variance with former law.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will say to the Speaker that I was not intending to rest the point of order I made on the fact that the revisers, by some means or other, when they undertook to recapitulate the sixty-sixth section of the statute that had so recently been passed fixing the mints of the United States, embraced one that had been apparently purposely dropped, but to place it on another point.

Admitting that the reason so far as it goes is binding, the point I wanted to make is this: I wanted to show to the Speaker and the House that all the laws relating to the branch mint at New Orleans, which had existed prior to the 12th of February, 1873, were wiped out by the legislation I have referred to, and that consequently in determining the question of order now raised reference alone can be had to the terms of the Revised Statutes. I desire to say that I admit that the Revised Statutes create a mint at New Orleans. Section 3496 of the Revised Statutes declares what the officers of the mint shall be and I will read it:

> The officers of each mint shall be a superintendent, an assayer, a melter and refiner, and a coiner; and, for the Mint at Philadelphia, an engraver; all to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

These two points are established. First, after the abolition of the branch mint, a mint was created at New Orleans; and, second, that the general statute provides that there shall be four officers there, namely, a superintendent, an assayer, a melter and refiner, and a coiner.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will look at section 3490 he will find that they are also allowed the assistance of clerks in the several mints at such and such annual salaries.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will come to that point presently. I am speaking now about the primary point, the principal one. The section I have read fixes no salary. We come then to section 3498 of the Revised Statutes. That section fixes the salaries of the officers of the mint at Philadelphia and San Francisco and at Carson City. It makes no provision for the salaries of superintendent, assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner at the mints either at Denver or New Orleans; so that there is no existing law fixing the salaries for those officers with reference to this mint about which I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to direct the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the sixty-fifth section of the act of February 12, 1873. He will find that in that section a superintendent of the mint at New Orleans is recognized, and additional duties are placed upon him.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I have the law here.

The SPEAKER. It is condensed in the Revised Statutes in the following words:

> The superintendents of the mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, and New Orleans shall be, and perform the duties of, treasurers of said mints respectively.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The mint, however, had been abolished. Now I propose to show, and the only point that I am now making, (I do not desire to advance more rapidly than I am doing)——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is listening with great attention to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The point I am endeavoring to make is that, so far as the four principal officers are concerned, by the Revised Statutes no such officers have a salary attached to their position, and consequently to affix a salary, unless subsequent legislation provides for it, would be new legislation.

Mr. MAISH. I ask if the gentleman's attention has been called to the act of 1874?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I was just coming to that, and I propose to make the point of order no broader than I am satisfied that it can be maintained, and that no man will be able to escape from it. Now, what was the legislation of 1874? On page 97 of the eighteenth volume of the Statutes at Large you find these words:

> To reopen the branch mint at New Orleans.

There was no such mint there; it had been wiped out of existence by the act of 1873. It had been by the revisers created into a mint at New Orleans. That was doubtless a mistake. I proceed to read from the law:

> To reopen the branch mint at New Orleans, to be conducted hereafter as a mint subject to the provisions and restrictions of the coinage act of 1873, the following appropriations are made.

Then it goes on to provide for a salary of the superintendent, $3,500; and for that of the assayer, who shall perform the duties of melter, $2,500, and to appropriate for the wages of workmen.

There I make two points: first, I say that the act of 1874 does not propose to create a salary. It simply declares that this superintendent, whose office had already been created, should receive for that fiscal year $3,500. But if the act of 1874 did create a salary, then the point of order would lie against every officer mentioned in the proposed amendment that is not embraced in this law.

I want, before proceeding further, to say that the legislation of the two last preceding years has nothing whatever to do with this question, and I think the Speaker will agree to that, as he was connected with that legislation, there being only a small amount of money appropriated for an assayer, who should be also a melter, to take charge of the mint, and a few laborers to run it as an assay office. Now, I am willing to concede for the sake of argument that the act of 1874 does create a salary; then, what officers are there whose salaries are thus created? There are a superintendent, an assayer who shall act as melter, and that is all.

Where, then, is the law to be found that authorizes, as this amendment proposes, not only a superintendent and an assayer, but in addition, one melter, one refiner, and one coiner, five officers in all, when the Revised Statutes themselves provide in reference to all the mints that, instead of there being two separate officers, for melter and refiner, the two offices shall be consolidated into one? The Chair will find by calculating the amount proposed to be appropriated for these officers, at $2,500 a year each, that the amendment proposes that the refiner and the melter shall be two separate officers. Therefore this amendment provides not only for officers who have never been provided for either in the Revised Statutes or in any statute passed since, but it also provides for an officer not authorized by the Revised Statutes; because the two offices of melter and refiner, as proposed by this amendment, are consolidated and made one office by the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MAISH. If I mistake not, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] omitted the office of "coiner" the other day in order to obviate that very objection.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It is not so in the RECORD, as I read it.

Mr. GIBSON. One office was omitted.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Even if it was omitted, that would not help it at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. The office of "coiner" is in the amendment.

Mr MAISH. It is there by mistake.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Even if the amendment should be changed as suggested, it would still be obnoxious to the point of order that the proposition has not been considered in Committee of the Whole. But I want to say further that the office of coiner is provided for in this amendment.

Mr. EDEN. Allow me to say that the word "coiner" was stricken out in Committee of the Whole when the point of order was raised.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It is not out of the amendment now.

The SPEAKER. If the law authorizes a mint surely it authorizes officers to run it. Subsequent sections do this in fact.

Mr. EDEN. One office was stricken out in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] will yield to me a single moment.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not familiar with the technical language of the amendment the gentleman is speaking of. But if it is true as he asserts that the office of melter and refiner are separated, then that is impossible legislation. The duties of melter and refiner are one and indivisible; you cannot refine without melting.

Mr. EDEN. Allow me to say that it was "the engraver" that was stricken out in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLEY. The engraver is one officer, and coiner is entirely a distinct officer, as much so as though he pertained to another business. The engraver simply cuts the steel dies; the coiner manipulates the metal from the time it is weighed to him until the coin and the cuttings are returned to be weighed. They work in different metals. The one works in steel and the other in the metals of our coinage.

Mr. ELAM. The "engraver" is stricken out.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The "coiner" was not stricken out.

Mr. MAISH. I was mistaken; it was "engraver," not "coiner," that was stricken out.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Still, if the word "coiner" was stricken out, that would not change the point I make, for the reason that by this amendment the melter and the refiner are retained as independent officers. That will be apparent to the Chair if he will compute the salaries of the officers provided for in the amendment at $2,500 each. In addition to that, the amendment contains the words "for the assayer, melter, refiner, and coiner, four in all, $2,500." If you were to strike out "coiner," there would still be left three officers, two of whom would be a melter and a refiner.

Now, in addition to that, I desire to say that the amendment also provides for a cashier, an officer unknown to the Revised Statutes in connection with the mint, and one that is not provided for, and never has been provided for since the revision of 1874, for the mint at New Orleans. Therefore it will be seen that neither in the Revised Statutes nor in any subsequent session-laws can there be found any authority for the appointment of a cashier.

The same is true in regard to other officers which this amendment provides for, weigh clerk, deposit clerk, book-keeper, and assayer's clerk. In addition to that it is new legislation, and not in the interest of economy, to provide for "repairs and machinery." No such thing as that is found in the Revised Statutes. The mint at New Orleans was recreated by the Revised Statutes, but there is no law now, and will be none unless we put one on the statute-book now, that provides either for machinery for or the repairs of that mint.

For that reason I submit that on any theory nearly everything that is embraced in this amendment is outside not only of the Revised Statutes but of any appropriation heretofore made in the session-laws since the revision took place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say——

Mr. HALE. The Chair will allow me a moment. What I have been mainly seeking to find out is how this amendment came here at all. It was considered and defeated in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present yesterday at the close of the afternoon session?

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that I was called away just before the close of the session.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will refer to the RECORD he will see that the amendment was admitted after the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. That is what I have been endeavoring to do. I can see no way in which the amendment can have come in except by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, after the matter had been decided in Committee of the Whole, yielding to allow the amendment to be submitted in the House, thus adding to the expenditures in the bill. Was that done?

The SPEAKER. There was considerable debate on the question, and the Chair has not the RECORD before him; but the gentleman will find that the amendment came in substantially as he supposed it did.

Mr. HALE. By the yielding of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. This amendment upon its face certainly does not enact new legislation. On the contrary, it proceeds upon an assumption that no new legislation is required. This mint was originally established in 1834, and there was a contract between the Government of the United States and the city of New Orleans that the city should grant the land necessary for the erection of a mint upon the condition that a mint should always be maintained at that point. The latest provision of law authorizing a mint at New Orleans seems to be the enactment in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. A branch mint.

The SPEAKER. A mint.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. There is a difference, if the Speaker will pardon me, between a branch mint, which is merely auxiliary, and an independent mint, which is subject simply to the control of the Superintendent of mints.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that both terms are meant to imply a place where gold and silver are coined.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. There is no doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. The third paragraph of section 3495 of the Revised Statutes makes in distinct terms this provision:

> Third. The mint of the United States at New Orleans.

The Chair supposes that the revisers in inserting this clause did so in pursuance of the sixty-fifth section of what is known as the coinage act of February 12, 1873, wherein a superintendent of the mint at New Orleans is recognized and the performance of additional duties is assigned to him.

It seems to the Chair that the act of 1874 also provides for the reopening of the mint at New Orleans, proceeding upon the same assumption as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] that there is a mint already authorized by law at New Orleans.

Allusion has been made to Senate bill No. 1058 as an indication that additional legislation is necessary to establish a mint at New Orleans. A careful reading of that bill, which is now in the hands of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, will show that it proceeds upon the same assumption: that there is by law a mint authorized at New Orleans.

Thus the general law, particularly section 3495 of the Revised Statutes, provides for a mint at New Orleans, and subsequent sections authorize and direct the appointment of officers to keep the mints in operation. In accordance with this state of the law the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on last Tuesday made this decision:

> As the law recognizes the existence of a mint at New Orleans, the Chair is inclined to hold that the necessary legislation to operate that mint is not new legislation in the sense of the rule, and that consequently such a provision is in order as an amendment to this bill. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] during the debate which then took place upon the point of order, said:

> Now, if there be a mint at New Orleans and if the usual officers for a mint at New Orleans are not provided for in this bill, I do not claim that it is new legislation to provide for them, whether they have been left out by inadvertence or by design. But if there be no mint there organized; if this is the establishment of a mint instead of an assay office as this bill provides for, then it will be new legislation. It was because I did not know what the law was upon that subject that I suggested to the Chair that it was new legislation.
> Now I understand the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] to read from the law which is unrepealed, as I understand him, to claim the establishment of a mint at New Orleans and to claim that the officers provided for in this amendment are the proper legal officers of this institution. If that be so, I cannot insist upon the point of order that it is new legislation.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in the course of the same debate, said:

> During the several years while I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, when there was not enough coinage being done to require the rehabilitation of any mint, and even when we were providing for the sale of mints at Charlotte and Dahlonega and other points, we still kept the New Orleans mint alive by keeping up the form of appropriation giving a small sum of money, because if we had not done so under the terms of the grant it would revert to its former owners. We are bound while we own it to keep it a mint.

This latter statement of the gentleman from Ohio referring to the period when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations agrees entirely with the recollection of the present occupant of the chair as to the action of the committee during the time he was its chairman. The committee at that time provided for keeping an officer at the New Orleans mint in order that the Government might retain the mint property under its contract with the city of New Orleans. This was avowedly the object.

The Chair, in view of the provision of section 3495 of the Revised Statutes, in consideration also of the act of 1874, and all the subsequent cumulative legislation recognizing a mint at New Orleans as established by law, is unwilling to reverse the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole upon this amendment. The Chair thinks proper to go further and say that he believes the mint at New Orleans to be a mint authorized by the statutes, and that consequently this amendment providing appropriations for keeping that mint in operation is not at variance with existing law, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the Chair will permit I would like to put a question. Does it appear to the Chair that this mint has constantly been kept up from the time of the grant made by the city of New Orleans to the present time?

The SPEAKER. It was continued in operation from 1834 till 1861; of course its operations were interrupted by the war; but its continuance as a mint is recognized by a variety of legislation since that time. The sixty-fifth section of the coinage act of 1873, section 3495 of the Revised Statutes, the act of 1874, the appropriations alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio as made during his chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations and similar appropriations made when the present occupant of the chair held the same position—the general course of legislation, together with the recent bill passed by the Senate, constitute a mass of cumulative evidence showing that the legislative department of the Government has distinctly and repeatedly recognized the mint at New Orleans as established by law. The Chair does not find any provision of law repealing such authorization directly or by inference.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the Chair is satisfied that the real estate on which this mint is located has never reverted to the grantor?

The SPEAKER. That is a legal proposition which the Chair is not called upon to decide. The Senate bill provides that before the expenditure of any money for said purpose the city of New Orleans shall release and quitclaim to the United States all title and all claim of every character, and all conditions of forfeiture to the lands and premises upon which said mint is located.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. One word on the point of order. I wish to state before I come to that, however, that last evening I took occasion to examine into the matter and I now state, as I believe, without any possibility of doubt, the fact that in the years 1870, 1871, 1872 and 1873 nothing was appropriated for the mint at New Orleans.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state in that connection, that the mere omission on the part of Congress to appropriate money does not necessarily repeal distinct law authorizing a certain thing to be done. Especially in the absence of a repealing provision. If Congress chooses to omit to appropriate when the law authorizes the thing to be done, the responsibility of course would be with Congress.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I grant that inasmuch as the mint at New Orleans was revived as a mint in the legislation of 1874, the responsibility of appropriation for prior years——

Mr. ELAM. I rise to a question of order, and the point I make is this, that the Chair having decided this question, it is not debatable unless an appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I rose to ask a question of the Chair in reference to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana raised the point of order, and the Chair has given his decision. The point is now made that further debate is not in order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I do not propose to debate it; I merely want to know the ground upon which the Chair bases his decision in reference to the last clause of the amendment, for repairs and machinery, $75,000, and that in view of the fact that this mint as a mint was created in 1874, and from that time down there has been no law upon the statute-book which provided for the purchase of machinery.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to decide, and the Chair would not like to express an opinion as to its propriety.

Mr. BEEBE. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana under the decision of the Chair is pending; but the first business in order will be on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to propose an amendment to that amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order unless by unanimous consent, the main question having been ordered.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent to provide for the salary of a laborer, which was unintentionally omitted from the bill. It is in line 181.

Mr. O'NEILL. The chairman of the committee I hope will give me consent to offer my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House can by unanimous consent allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his amendment, and that is the only way in which it can come in.

Mr. O'NEILL. It does not add a dollar of expense.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent to supply an omission; the laborer is already provided for in the bill, but the salary has unintentionally been omitted. I move, in line 181, after the words "one laborer," to insert "$600."

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BEEBE. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. There was quite a number of amendments in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on which separate votes were not demanded. If there be no objection, the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on which separate votes are not demanded will be taken in gross, and then a vote will be taken separately upon the amendments on which separate votes have been asked.

There was no objection.

The amendments on which separate votes were not asked were then concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GAUSE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask for a separate vote on the amendment in line 1651 in reference to the entry of public lands.

The SPEAKER. It is the gentleman's right, and a separate vote will be taken upon the amendment when it is reached in its turn.

The Clerk will now read the amendments in their order as reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on which separate votes have been demanded.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Are these amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Not by the Appropriations Committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether they were offered by the committee or not; he believes some were, and that others were adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union which did not come from the Committee on Appropriations. The Clerk will now read the first amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on which a separate vote has been asked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 1203, down to and including the word "each" in line 1207; that is, strike out the following words: "six clerks of class 4, four clerks of class 3, five clerks of class 2, seventy clerks of class 1, twenty-eight clerks at $1,000, twenty-eight clerks at $900 each;" and in lieu thereof to insert as follows:

Eight clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; one hundred and twenty clerks of class 1, twenty-eight of whom shall be temporary.

Mr. HALE. In what Department or bureau is this? Gentlemen have not their bills before them, and it would better explain the amendment to know under what heading it is.

The SPEAKER. It is under the heading of the Surgeon-General's Office.

The House divided; and there were ayes 93, noes 91.

Mr. ATKINS demanded tellers.

Mr. PAGE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to ask a question for information. Is not this amendment in relation to the clerks of the Surgeon-General's Office?

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The SPEAKER. It has been twice read already. Is there objection to the amendment being read a third time?

Objection was made.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 115, not voting 62; as follows:

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. HATCHER. My colleague from Missouri, Mr. MORGAN, is paired with Mr. JAMES, of New York.

Mr. BOONE. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS, is paired with Mr. OLIVER, of Iowa.

Mr. ATKINS. I beg to state that the pair of Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, is with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOONE. I was informed by my colleague, Mr. BLACKBURN, that the pair was with Mr. OLIVER. I accept the correction of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ELLIS. My colleague from Louisiana, Mr. ACKLEN, is absent by reason of sickness.

Mr. STENGER. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. CLYMER, is paired with Mr. CLAFLIN, of Massachusetts. Mr. POTTER, of New York, is paired with Mr. PUGH, of New York.

Mr. HOUSE. My colleague from Tennessee, Mr. BRIGHT, is paired with Mr. ELLSWORTH, of Michigan.

Mr. MARTIN. My colleague from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRAGG. My colleague from Wisconsin, Mr. POUND, is absent by leave of the House. On all questions on which he and I differ we are paired. On this question, if he were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. MCKENZIE. I am paired with Mr. PRICE, of Iowa. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. EICKHOFF. I am paired with Mr. BALLOU, of Rhode Island.

Mr. COVERT. My colleague from New York, Mr. QUINN, is paired with my other colleague, Mr. BAKER. On this question Mr. QUINN would vote "no" and Mr. BAKER would vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. VEEDER, is paired with my colleague, Mr. STARIN. Mr. VEEDER would vote "no" and Mr. STARIN would vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. BLISS, is paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan. I do not know how either gentleman would vote.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am paired with Mr. REED, of Maine. If he were here, I would vote "no" and I presume he would vote "ay."

Mr. COOK. I am paired with Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. PUGH. I am paired with Mr. POTTER of New York. If he were present, I would vote "ay" and he would vote "no."

Mr. COLE. My colleague from Missouri, Mr. MORGAN, is paired with Mr. JAMES, of New York, on political questions.

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MULLER. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. HALE. My colleague from Maine, Mr. POWERS, is paired with Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky. If Mr. POWERS were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. PAGE. I am paired with my colleague from California, Mr. LUTTRELL, who is detained from the House by illness. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. HENDEE. My colleague from Vermont, Mr. DENISON, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. My colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, is paired with Mr. BRIGHT, of Tennessee. My colleague, if present, would vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. WILLITS, is paired with Mr. HARDENBERGH, of New Jersey.

Mr. METCALFE. I am paired with my colleague from Missouri, Mr. BLAND.

Mr. CUMMINGS. My colleague from Iowa, Mr. PRICE, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. On this and other votes of this character I am paired with Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I am paired with Mr. FREEMAN, of Pennsylvania. If he were here, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. BREWER. My colleague from Michigan, Mr. HUBBELL, is paired with Mr. BLISS, of New York.

Mr. KIMMEL. I was not in the House when the last name on the roll was called. I ask leave to vote.

Mr. SAMPSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. On agreeing to the amendment the yeas are 115 and the nays are 114. The Chair votes in the negative, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote had been asked was upon striking out the clause in relation to the office of the Surgeon-General's Office, which had been amended in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union so as to read as follows:

And the entire clerical force, three excepted, now employed on the Medical and Surgical History of the War shall be employed on the work necessary to the prompt payment of pensions.

The question was put upon agreeing to the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 76, noes 81.

Mr. COX, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he will not accept this amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing that the words "six excepted" shall be put in instead of the words "three excepted," as inserted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reach his object by moving to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I make that motion.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. MILLS, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Is it understood that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] agrees to the amendment inserting "six?"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has indicated his purpose to accept this amendment with a modification.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is whether it is not competent for the House, by unanimous consent, to amend this clause by inserting the word "six" instead of "three?" [Cries of "Regular Order."]

The question was again put upon ordering the yeas and nays; and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 115, not voting 68; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. COVERT. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. VEEDER, is paired with my other colleague, Mr. STARIN. I also desire to say that my colleague, Mr. QUINN, is paired with my colleague, Mr. BAKER. My colleague, Mr. BLISS, is paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan.

Mr. BOONE. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. WILLIS, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRAGG. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. POUND, who is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I desire to repeat that I am paired with Mr. FREEMAN.

Mr. MARTIN. My colleague, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know how either of them would vote if here.

Mr. MULDROW. My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is absent by leave of the House. He is paired with some one, I am informed, but I do not know who it is.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to say that I am paired with Mr. PRICE. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. HAMILTON. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. RIDDLE. I am paired with Mr. REED, of Maine; but I have been informed that he would vote "ay," and as I desire to vote the same way I desire to record my vote.

Mr. PUGH. I am paired with Mr. POTTER, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. WARD. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. EVANS, is paired with Mr. KENNA.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague, Mr. LUTTRELL, is paired with Mr. DENISON.

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with Mr. MULLER. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. CRAPO, is paired with Mr. COOK, of Georgia.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, is paired with Mr. BLISS. If my colleague were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. My colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, is paired with Mr. BRIGHT; and I also would say that Mr. WILLITS is paired with Mr. HARDENBERGH.

Mr. METCALFE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BLAND.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I am paired with Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PUGH. I am informed that Mr. POTTER voted for this amendment in Committee of the Whole. I am not paired with him definitely upon this bill, but upon all political questions, and I therefore feel at liberty to vote for the amendment.

Mr. COLE. I beg again to announce that my colleague, Mr. MORGAN, is paired with Mr. JAMES, of New York, on all political questions.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that by unanimous consent this clause be amended by inserting the words "six excepted" instead of "three excepted," after the words "entire clerical force."

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object or not? It is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, well; the Chair allowed the gentleman to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. It was by unanimous consent; debate is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I do not propose to debate. I will object, and say nothing.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair refused to hear a word.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CONGER. I am willing that the record shall stand.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote had been asked was the one adopted in Committee of the Whole upon motion of Mr. VANCE, to amend the paragraph in relation to the United States Patent Office so as to read as follows:

United States Patent Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, $4,500; for assistant commissioner, $3,000; for chief clerk, $2,250; three examiners-in-chief, at $3,000 each; examiner in charge of interferences, $2,500; trade-mark examiner, $2,500; twenty-two principal examiners, at $2,500 each; twenty-two first assistant examiners, at $1,800 each; twenty-two second assistant examiners, at $1,600 each; twenty-two third assistant examiners, at $1,400 each; one financial clerk, $2,000, &c.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 64, noes 67.

Mr. VANCE. Is that a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. VANCE. Then I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. VANCE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 65, noes 85.

The SPEAKER announced that the amendment had not been agreed to.

After a pause,

Mr. BUTLER said: The yeas and nays have been called for on that last amendment.

The SPEAKER. By whom?

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. On what?

Mr. BUTLER. On the amendment in relation to the salary of the examiners in the Patent Office.

The SPEAKER. Were they demanded in time?

Mr. LATHROP. I called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman rise in his seat and call for them?

Mr. LATHROP. Part way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House.

The question was then taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 21 in the affirmative—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the amendment was accordingly rejected.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote had been called was to the paragraph relating to public lands situated in States where there are no land offices, and was to strike out the following:

And that the necessary proofs and affidavits required in such cases may be made before some officer competent to administer oaths, whose official character shall be duly certified by the clerk of a court of record. And moneys received by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for lands entered by cash entry shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I hope the amendment will be voted down. If adopted, it would be ruinous to the land interest of the country.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, as the gentleman well knows. The Clerk will read the remainder of the amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

And insert in lieu of the portion stricken out these words:

And that the necessary proofs and affidavits required in all cases under the homestead, pre-emption, and timber-culture laws may be made before any officer competent to administer oaths under the law of the State or Territory where the applicant resides: Provided, That the official character of the officer taking such proof or affidavit shall be duly certified by the clerk of a court of record. And all moneys received by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for lands entered by cash entry shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. EDEN. I understand that under that amendment——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. EDEN. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether the amendment authorizing enlisted men without limitation to be assigned to duty in the Surgeon-Generals Office was adopted? I refer to the amendment allowing an unlimited number of enlisted men to be assigned to pension work in the Surgeon-General's Office.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. No separate vote was asked upon that amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, there was.

The SPEAKER. If there was a separate vote asked, the Chair will submit the amendment to the House.

Mr. CONGER. I had supposed it was not adopted, and for that reason I objected to the modification suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] some time since. I have since been informed that the amendment in regard to enlisted men was adopted; if so, I wish to withdraw my objection.

Mr. THOMPSON. That amendment was reached, but I think no separate vote was asked upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. So far as I am concerned, I am very willing that there shall be six clerks in place of three in the Surgeon-General's Office assigned to duty upon the Medical and Surgical History of the War.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I hope that will be agreed to.

There was no objection; and the amendment suggested by Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I would inquire where the words "three excepted" are to be found?

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. In line 1217.

The SPEAKER. The words "three excepted" were inserted in the clause in the Committee of the Whole; after which the entire clause was stricken out. The motion to strike out was not agreed to in the House, and the clause has been amended by unanimous consent as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] The Clerk will read the clause as now amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the entire clerical force, six excepted, now employed on the Medical and Surgical History of the War shall be employed on the work necessary to the prompt payment of pensions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] now asks whether an amendment was adopted allowing enlisted men to be detailed for pension work. The Chair thinks it was adopted with other amendments in gross. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] asserts that a separate vote was asked upon that amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; that is my recollection.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think there was not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No separate vote was asked on that amendment. My recollection is very clear on the point.

Mr. ATKINS. I was under the impression that I asked for a separate vote; but I will not positively assert that I did. I may not have done so.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is one of those which were adopted in gross, no separate vote being demanded.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move to reconsider and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. That has already been done.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded was read, as follows:

In line 1700 strike out "twelve" and insert "fifteen;" in line 1701, after the word "twenty," insert "four;" in the same line strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-three;" in lines 1702 and 1703 strike out "sixteen clerks, at $1,000 each;" so that, if amended, the clause will read: "fifteen clerks of class 3; twenty-four clerks of class 2; thirty-three clerks of class 1."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 57, noes 73.

Mr. KEIFER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 101, nays 118, not voting 72; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BOONE. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SMITH.

Mr. MARTIN. My colleague, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. KENNA, if present, would, I presume, vote "no." I do not know how Mr. EVANS would vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague, Mr. COOK, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CRAPO.

Mr. EICKHOFF. I repeat the announcement that I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am paired generally with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED; but being informed that on this question he would vote "ay," I vote "ay."

Mr. BEEBE. My colleague, Mr. COVERT, is paired with my colleague, Mr. KETCHAM; my colleague, Mr. VEEDER, with my colleague, Mr. STARIN; my colleague, Mr. QUINN, with my colleague, Mr. BAKER, of New York; my colleague, Mr. BLISS, with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HUBBELL.

Mr. COLE. I announce again the pair of my colleague, Mr. MORGAN, with the gentleman from New York, Mr. JAMES.

Mr. WARD. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. EVANS, is paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. CRAPO, is paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK.

Mr. STONE of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. PRICE, is paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. TIPTON. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I should vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. HAYES, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DEAN.

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. STEWART, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MULLER. Mr. STEWART, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. My colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, is paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BRIGHT. My colleague, Mr. WILLITS, is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HARDENBERGH.

Mr. BRAGG. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. POUND, who is absent by leave of the House. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. PAGE. My colleague, Mr. LUTTRELL, detained from the House by sickness, is paired with the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. DENISON.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. QUINN. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Colorado, Mr. PATTERSON, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ERRETT.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next amendment on which a separate vote is asked will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 1759 and 1760 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1760 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1761 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000." Amend line 1762 by striking out "$1,400" and inserting "$1,600." Amend line 1764 by striking out "$1,900" and inserting "$2,000;" so that it will read: "chief clerk, $2,000; entomologist, $2,000; chemist, $2,000; assistant chemist, $1,600; superintendent of experimental gardens and grounds, $2,000."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 81; no quorum voting.

Mr. CUTLER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CUTLER and Mr. DURHAM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 109.

Mr. CUTLER demanded the yeas and nays and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded was read by the Clerk, as follows:

In line 1766, strike out "six" and insert "eight," so it will read as follows: disbursing clerk, $1,800.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment on which a separate vote is asked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 1906, "14,000" and insert "10,000."

Mr. RAINEY. I ask unanimous consent to submit a few remarks.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the House will hear him.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. For how long?

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. No gentleman has risen in his place and objected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLS, (rising.) Yes; I object.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I gave notice yesterday that I wanted a separate vote on the amendment in line 1790.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take it out of the amendments adopted and voted on in gross.

Mr. ATKINS. The amendment was defeated. I think it was offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be allowed to print some remarks correcting some remarks made upon the floor yesterday.

There was no objection; and leave was granted to Mr. RAINEY to print remarks as part of the debates. [See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCOOK] refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

And said seed, except flower-seed, shall be distributed to each congressional district in the several States and Territories in proportion to the agricultural population residing in the same.

Mr. MCCOOK. That is the amendment to which I have reference.

The SPEAKER. Under the statement of the gentleman from New York, there being no objection, that amendment will be taken out of those voted on in gross and will now be separately voted on as it is no more than right the gentleman should have that privilege, having given notice in the House that he called for a separate vote on it.

There was no objection.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 58.

Mr. MCCOOK. I do not like to delay the legislation of the House.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MCCOOK. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment. I want to see by the record who is willing to vote for such legislation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is amendment to the amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wish to strike out the words "except flower-seed."

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. HANNA. That is not the amendment to which the gentleman objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman thinks it is.

Mr. MCCOOK. If I am allowed to explain I will show the gentleman that it is.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 99, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—111.

So the amendment was adopted.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. BOONE. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOUSE. I am paired with Mr. DANFORD, of Ohio. If I were not paired, I would vote "ay."

Mr. STENGER. I desire to announce that my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. CLYMER, is paired with Mr. CLAFLIN, of Massachusetts. I desire also to announce that Mr. POTTER, of New York, is paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey.

Mr. MARTIN. My colleague from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am paired with Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. COOK. I am paired with Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts. If he were present, I would vote "no" and I believe he would vote "ay."

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with Mr. MULLER, of New York.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. PRICE, is paired with Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky.

Mr. HAYES. I am paired with Mr. DEAN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. TIPTON. I am paired with Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. STRAIT. I am paired with Mr. GLOVER, of Missouri. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. HENDERSON. I am requested to announce that Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, and Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania, are paired.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment on which a separate vote has been demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1906 strike out "$14,000" and insert "$10,000;" so that it will read:

For rent of four floors of the building occupied by the Department of Justice, $10,000.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON.] The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph from line 966 to line 974, as follows:

Mint at New Orleans, Louisiana:

For salaries: assayer in charge, $2,000; and the assayer is hereby authorized, in case of necessity, to employ one clerk, at a compensation of not exceeding $1,200 per annum; melter, $2,000; wages of workmen, $3,000; fuel, fluxes, acids, and other incidental expenses, $2,062; in all, $10,262.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mint at New Orleans:

For salary of the superintendent, $3,500; for the assayer, melter, refiner, and coiner, four in all, $2,500 each; cashier, $2,000; chief clerk, $2,000; weigh clerk, deposit clerk, and book-keeper, at $1,600; assayers' clerk, $1,600; in all, $23,900.

For wages of workmen and adjusters, $57,000.

For fuel, fluxes, light, lead, copper, acids, chemicals, crucibles, and for incidental and contingent expenses, $30,000.

For repairs and machinery, $75,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a clerical error in the amendment which I would suggest should be corrected. The word "and" should be inserted between the word "melter" and the word "refiner." "Melter and refiner" describe one office. As written in the amendment it would appear that there were two separate offices.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be modified as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

There was no objection; and the amendment was modified accordingly.

The question being taken on the amendment as modified, there were—ayes 71, noes 66.

Mr. FORT and Mr. COLE called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 51.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 91, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—125.

Crapo,	Kenna,	Reed,

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HOUSE. I am paired with Mr. DANFORD, of Ohio. If I were unpaired, I should vote "ay."

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I am paired with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. DURHAM. I am paired upon this question with Mr. COVERT, of New York. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. RIDDLE. I am paired with Mr. REED. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I should vote "ay."

Mr. PUGH. I am paired with Mr. POTTER. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Upon this question I am paired with Mr. KIMMEL, of Maryland. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. PRICE, is paired with Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, is paired with Mr. BRIGHT, of Tennessee. I desire also to state that my colleague, Mr. WILLITS, is paired with Mr. HARDENBERGH. I am myself paired with Mr. ROBERTS.

Mr. HAYES. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DEAN.

Mr. TIPTON. I am paired upon this question with Mr. COX, of New York. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. BREWER. I desire to say that Mr. HUBBELL is paired with Mr. BLISS.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. GIBSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to save the consequences of the modification made in the amendment on the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the word "four" be stricken out and "three" inserted in lieu thereof, and that the whole amount of the appropriation be $21,400 instead of $23,900.

There was no objection and the modification was made; so that the clause will read:

Mint at New Orleans:

For salary of the superintendent, $3,500; for the assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, three in all, $2,500 each; cashier, $2,000; chief clerk, $2,000; weigh clerk, deposit clerk, and book-keeper, at $1,600; assayer's clerk, $1,600; in all, $21,400.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, until Wednesday next, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mary Quinn, of Lexington, Kentucky, no adverse report having been made thereon.

On motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of the Presbyterian church at Saint Augustine, Florida, no adverse report having been made thereon.

On motion of Mr. MCMAHON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of J. Oblinger, of Union City, in reference to postal-cards, for reference to the Postmaster-General, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up the tariff bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. Pending that motion, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WOOD. I hope that motion will not be carried.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope it will. We have done a good week's work, and do not want to have the tariff bill up.

The question was put upon Mr. O'NEILL's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 112, noes 61.

Mr. WOOD. I call for tellers.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. We may as well have the yeas and nays at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 95, not voting 92; as follows:

YEAS—104.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce again that my colleague, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. If present, Mr. KENNA would vote "no."

Mr. TUNRER. I am paired with Mr. STEWART, of Minnesota. If here, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. PUGH. I am paired with Mr. POTTER, of New York. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. COLE. My colleague, Mr. MORGAN, is paired with Mr. JAMES, of New York.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I am paired with Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire. I am paired with Mr. BAGLEY, of New York. I understand that if he were here he would vote "ay." I would vote "no."

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. A. HERR SMITH, is absent by leave of the House. If present, he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CALKINS: The petition of citizens of Lake County, Indiana, for Government aid to the Texas and Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Also, the petition of Hon. Joseph Henderson, D. R. Leeper, and 70 other citizens of South Bend and Valparaiso, Indiana, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of citizens of Gaysport, Pennsylvania, for the extension of the national credit to aid in the completion of the great southern line of railroad to the Pacific Ocean—to the same committee.

By Mr. DAVIS, of California: Resolutions of trades and labor unions of San Francisco, California, opposing the passage of the Wood tariff bill, and for legislation preventing Chinese immigration—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. FENN: A communication from Major John Green, First Cavalry, United States Army, forwarded through the Adjutant-General's Office, relative to a military wagon-road between Fort Boisé and Fort Lapwai, Idaho Territory—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LATHROP: The petition of Charles Sabin and others, of Illinois, for the removal of the duty on quinine—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of N. C. Thompson and over 100 others; and of Emerson Talcott & Co. and more than 200 others, manufacturers, business men, and laborers of Winnebago County, Illinois, against the passage of the Wood tariff bill, against the imposition of duties on tea and coffee, and against the income tax—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Justin P. Goodale, John A. Rogers, and other citizens of Elgin, Illinois, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of soldiers of the Sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, that a pension be granted to Nancy Bush—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORSE: The petition of Vashti H. Palmer, for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. PAGE: Three petitions of citizens of San Francisco, California, for the passage of such laws as will enable the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to extend said road from the Colorado River at Fort Yuma through Arizona and New Mexico, and until a connection is made with the Gulf of Mexico—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 6, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

RETIREMENT OF LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

The bill (H. R. No. 4663) to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes, received from the House of Representatives, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read again and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to its reference. I ask that the bill be read the second time and ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. MORRILL. If it is not to be referred to the Committee on Finance, I object to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill, then, having been read the first time, will lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read but once, and will lie upon the table, objection being made to a second reading at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want the record to show that.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General in relation to the employment, in the revenue service, of W. R. Whitaker; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, a copy of a letter from T. J. Spencer, brevet captain United States Army, in connection with the letters and telegram from Colonel B. H. Grierson, Tenth Cavalry, published in Senate executive document No. 52; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of J. A. Whittier, president of the Saginaw (Michigan) Lumber Association and Board of Trade, remonstrating against any legislation which would reduce the duties upon lumber without any reciprocal advantages; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Charles Reitz & Brothers and 115 others, citizens of Manistee, Michigan, praying for an appropriation of $30,000 for the improvement of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of Thomas M. Nelson, J. M. Jones, and 20 others, purchasers of certain railroad lands granted to the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad Company, remonstrating against the confirmation by Congress of the action of the Michigan State board of control of railroad lands in deeding said grant of lands to the Port Huron and Lake Michigan Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of L. J. Johnson and 200 others, citizens of Indiana, and the petition of Samuel F. Allen and 104 others, citizens of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill now pending before Congress to aid in the completion of the Texas and Pacific Railway; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. McDONALD. I present the petition of Conrad Baker and 28 others, citizens of Indianapolis, Indiana, in behalf of General John C. Fremont, praying that he may be included in the bill now pending before the Senate placing General James Shields on the retired list. I present this petition by request, and take pleasure in stating to the Senate that the signatures to the petition are of the most reputable citizens of my city. I think, however, that their attention would not have been drawn to the matter but for the fact that some little political capital may be expected to grow out of it. I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of R. W. York and others, the petition of C. L. Williams and others, and the petition of Philip Parker and others, all of North Carolina, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Morrisville, in Wake County, to Rialto, in Chatham County, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a resolution of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, Missouri, urging the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will report the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and was read, as follows:

MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE OF SAINT LOUIS,
Saint Louis, May 2, 1878.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Exchange, held this day, the following was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, (by the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be earnestly requested to urge the prompt passage of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, and that the same take effect immediately, as a delay to a later date for its enforcement is calculated to keep business prostrate and invite a further demoralization in the trade of the country.

Yours, respectfully,

GEORGE H. MORGAN, Secretary.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a telegram numerously signed by bankers, merchants, and citizens of the city of Dubuque, Iowa, asking for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law. I will say that I personally know most of the signers of this petition, and I think none of them are in debt a single dollar, or if in debt can pay at any moment.

The telegram is as follows:

DUBUQUE, IOWA, May 2, 1878.

To Hon. W. B. ALLISON, United States Senate.

Nine tenths of the square business men of Iowa demand the immediate and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt act.

C. H. EIGHMEY.	DE WITT C. CRAM.
H. M. KINGMAN.	H. B. GLOVER & CO.
W. L. BRADLEY.	W. E. MOTT, HOWARD & CO.
W. G. STEWART.	WILLIAM H. PEABODY.
EDWARD A. LULL.	JOHN H. LULL.
ANDREW TREDWAY & SONS.	JOHN BELL & CO.
JACOB CHRISTMAN.	JOHN MEHLHOP.
M. M. WALKER.	POOL, GILLIAN & CO.
WESTPHAL, HINDS & CO.	W. H. RUMPF.
G. BECKER.	C. S. BENTLEY & CO.
H. S. HETHERINGTON.

I move that this paper lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented the memorial of the Grand Council of the Six Nations New York Indians, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 692) to provide a settlement with the Six Nations of New York Indians for unexecuted treaty stipulations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I present a petition, signed by the governor of Rhode Island and a large number of highly respectable citizens of that State, in regard to the bill placing General James Shields on the retired list. The petition respectfully represents that "the undersigned citizens of the State of Rhode Island, in view of the present circumstances of Hon. James Shields, late major-general of United States Volunteers, and formerly in the service of the United States as a general commanding a division in the war with Mexico, believe that some action should be taken whereby the valuable services rendered by him should receive a national recognition; and your memorialists would therefore respectfully petition Congress to assign him to such a position as shall be commensurate with the services heretofore rendered by him to the National Government." I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I present a memorial, signed by Alexander Mitchell and others, merchants of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and by others in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, representing "that the vast interests involved in the maintenance of telegraphic communication between the United States and the rest of the world require the utmost facility to be given therefor," and they therefore request Congress "to reject all applications for exclusive privileges, and to pass a law giving permission to any and all persons and companies, without preference, to land telegraphic cables on the shores of the United States, and through them keep up telegraphic communication between this and other countries." I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial signed by a large number of highly respectable citizens of the city and State of New York, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Harlem River. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE presented the memorial of the Engineers' Club, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in favor of the continuance of the appropriation for the board for testing iron and steel, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the petition of A. McAllister and others, citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railway; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented three memorials of Councils 9, 89, and 174, of the Order of United American Mechanics of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE. I present also two telegrams from leading citizens, merchants, and presidents of banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, urging the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law without any delay as to date. These gentlemen are prominent and leading citizens of that city, and their solvency is unquestioned. I move that these telegrams lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of James Russell, N. J. Pierson, and others, captains and owners of vessels, and citizens of Pennsylvania and other States, praying the passage of a law abolishing compulsory pilotage upon vessels enrolled and engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK. I have received a telegram in the form of a petition from a large number of leading business houses in the city of Louisville, to the following effect:

The undersigned, representing as they believe truly the sentiment of the larger mass of the people of the State, would respectfully request you to urge with all possible dispatch the passage of a bill to repeal the present odious bankrupt law, and that by all means the same be made to take effect immediately, as a delay to a later date for its enforcement will keep business prostrate and insure a further demoralization on the trade of the country.

It is signed by most of the leading business men of Louisville. I desire, therefore, in accordance with this telegram, to give notice that I shall move when the bill is taken up to strike out the words "on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879." So that the bill in that particular may pass as it originally passed the Senate. I move that this telegram lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I present the petition of Sarah S. Flagg, executrix of the last will and testament of the late Willard C. Flagg, of Madison County, Illinois. Her husband was collector of internal revenue and settled his affairs with the Government, and, as she says, overpaid the Government. The object of this petition is to get back what was overpaid. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of Theophilus Fisk Mills, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying an appropriation by Congress as a reward for a certain mechanism which he has devised; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of the board of officers Second Regiment Illinois National Guards, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army, on the retired list; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Justin P. Goodale and 58 others, manufacturers of wool at Elgin, Illinois, remonstrating against any reduction of the duties on imports, the reimposition of the war tax on tea and coffee, and the imposition of a tax on incomes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George W. Matthews, of Edgar County, Illinois, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROLLINS presented certain papers from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, in relation to the bill (S. No. 1088) providing for the correction and revision of assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL presented two memorials of citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri, engaged in the steamboat business, praying Congress to take action on the bill (H. R. No. 2478) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels, and recommending the passage of the bill as it passed the House; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented a resolution of the Columbia Council No. 1 of the Sovereigns of Industry of the District of Columbia, representing five hundred families in the District, in favor of the passage of a law providing for the appointment of a coal-weigher for the District and requiring dealers in coal to send the certificate of such coal-weigher with each load of coal sold; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Williams, praying compensation for additional labor and material expended in the erection of the Jefferson school building of the District of Columbia by reason of changes in the plan of said building after the execution of the contract for the erection thereof, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. EATON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1069) for the relief of Emanuel Jones, a British subject, have instructed me to report it back and ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of this bill. If the person seeking relief is a British subject, the Department of State can provide the relief desired.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1130) to regulate the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust in the District of Columbia and to prevent fraudulent releases, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1028) declaratory of the law relating to decedents and inheritance in the District of Columbia in certain cases, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1108) to transfer the title of the United States to square 109 to the District of Columbia for the benefit of the public schools thereof, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 726) for the relief of Henry E. Sizer, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Thompson, widow of William Thompson, late second lieutenant Company E, Twelfth New York Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

INDEX TO CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate "to inquire into and report the expediency of abolishing the separate index now required for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and for the restoration of the index into each volume," ask to be discharged from its further consideration. As several Senators have spoken to me upon the subject, it is proper to explain that while there is a great convenience in having the index printed in every volume, as it was in the Congressional Globe for a short time, the volume of the RECORD has increased so much, and the index being very copious, has also increased so much, that it would nearly double the bulk of the RECORD and would entail an expense of over $70,000 a Congress to put the index in each volume. Such a system would have increased the number of volumes of the Forty-fourth Congress from eight to sixteen. It would furthermore delay the publication of the RECORD. Each volume can now be published as fast as the reports are completed, and the index goes on pari passu with the reports; but if the index were to be put into each volume the publication would be necessarily delayed until the whole was completed, and it would make a difference of some months in the delivery of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1190) for the relief of James McGraw; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McDONALD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1191) for the relief of the Evansville, Cairo and Memphis Packet Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1192) to authorize the leasing of a portion of the military reservation of New San Diego, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1193) for paying the advances made to the United States by the State of Maryland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1194) to amend section 5419 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EATON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1195) to extend for the term of seven years a patent, No. 34377, granted to Alba F. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1196) granting a pension to Jane D. Cotton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That Anna M. Marshal have leave to withdraw from the Senate files of the Forty-second Congress the papers accompanying her application for pension by special act.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I submit an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. I have not read the amendment, but present it by request. I move its reference to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask leave to make a report on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to accompany an amendment reported from that committee by me on last Thursday to the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. I move that the report be printed, and referred, with the amendment, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER and Mr. SAULSBURY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HILL, Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. MERRIMON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask the Senator from Ohio to allow the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876. It was passed over the other day in considering unobjected cases on the Calendar in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and myself. It will take but a minute to consider it. If it leads to any discussion I will give way.

Mr. THURMAN. Can a vote be taken upon it without debate?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes, sir. If it causes any delay I shall not press it. The joint resolution simply requires the addition of the word "Territories" after the word "States" to perfect it. The bill merely authorizes the issue of arms to Territories as well as to States. It passed the House and is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THURMAN. If it gives rise to no debate, I have no objection; but, if it does, I must call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will require an explanation, I am sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will require explanation, Mr. President. I do not object to its being taken up at this time; but the Senator from Ohio must not expect that the bill is going to pass without a little consideration.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think if the Senator from Vermont would hear the bill read through he would withhold his objection.

Mr. PADDOCK. Nothing is contemplated by the bill but to enable the Territories, which have been excluded, to have arms issued to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not object to the bill being taken up; I only said it would need a little explanation.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senate may proceed with the bankrupt law repeal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks the consideration of the House amendments to the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law, which are now before the Senate, the question being on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to the second amendment of the House of Representatives, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on the Judiciary report to strike out the second amendment of the House of Representatives in the words "and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder," and in lieu thereof to insert:

And in respect of all pains, penalties, and forfeitures which shall have been incurred under any of said acts prior to the day when this act takes effect, or which may be hereafter incurred, under any of those provisions of any of said acts which, for the purposes named in this act, are kept in force, and all penal actions and criminal proceedings for a violation of any of said acts, whether then pending or thereafter instituted, and in respect of all rights of debtors and creditors (except the right of commencing original proceedings in bankruptcy,) and all rights of, and suits by, or against assignees, under any, or all of said acts, in any matter or case which shall have arisen prior to the day when this act takes effect (which shall be on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879,) or in any matter or case which shall arise after this act takes effect, in respect of any matter of bankruptcy authorized by this act to be proceeded with after said last-named day.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That such repeal shall in no manner invalidate or affect any case in bankruptcy instituted and pending in any court prior to the day when this act shall take effect; but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and in respect of all pains, penalties, and forfeitures which shall have been incurred under any of said acts prior to the day when this act takes effect, or which may be thereafter incurred, under any of those provisions of any of said acts which, for the purposes named in this act, are kept in force, and all penal actions and criminal proceedings for a violation of any of said acts, whether then pending or thereafter instituted, and in respect of all rights of debtors and creditors, (except the right of commencing original proceedings in bankruptcy,) and all rights of, and suits by, or against assignees, under any, or all of said acts, in any matter or case which shall have arisen prior to the day when this act takes effect, (which shall be on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879,) or in any matter or case which shall arise after this act takes effect, in respect of any matter of bankruptcy authorized by this act to be proceeded with after said last-named day, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] the other day stated that the creditors, and not the debtors, were pressing for the repeal of the bankrupt law. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] this morning read a memorial from bankers and merchants in Dubuque who he said did not owe a dollar to anybody in the world, and who wanted the law repealed; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] this morning read a memorial from merchants and bankers of Louisville to the same effect. I am glad to see that this feeling is not shared by all eminent merchants in this country, for I hold in my hand a dispatch from Field, Leiter & Co., of Chicago, who I think are the most extensive merchants west of the Alleghany Mountains, and second to but one or two firms in the United States. They are successful merchants, and highly honorable men, and they sent me the following telegram when the amendment was adopted by the Senate:

We favor a bankrupt law, and think it best to amend present one, which we hope can be accomplished next session, and therefore favor Senate amendment.

I thought it proper to have both sides of this question before the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask if the amendment is in order, of which I gave notice, to strike out in lines 32, 33, and 34 "on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879," and insert in lieu thereof "from and after its passage." If in order I ask a vote on that amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. BECK. In lines 32, 33, and 34 I move to strike out the words "on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879," and insert in lieu thereof "from and after its passage."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. McDONALD. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that to strike out all included in the parenthesis in those lines would effect his purpose without inserting anything.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps it would, but the way I propose to amend makes it very plain.

Mr. McDONALD. It makes it no plainer. If there is no future time fixed the act will take effect upon its approval as a matter of course.

Mr. BECK. I am aware of that fact, but my amendment certainly makes it very distinct.

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit that the amendment is not now in order. The Senate has already adopted this amendmennt, I understand.

Mr. BECK. Never.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. My understanding was that this amendment was adopted by the Senate, but the subject was referred to the committee simply for the purpose of amplifying it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was referred to the committee, and the committee have made their report. The committee reported an amendment. The Senator from Kentucky proposes now to amend that amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. As the Chair has properly stated, the Senate amended the amendment of the House, and then without having adopted the amendment as amended the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee have reported the amendment before the Senate.

I only want to call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky. He proposes to strike out the words "on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879," and insert in lieu thereof "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. BECK. "From and after its passage."

Mr. THURMAN. If the amendment prevails, then, as I understand the rules of the Senate, you cannot alter the amendment, and those who might be opposed to the act taking effect on the 1st day of January next, but would prefer that it should take effect on the 1st of September, or the 1st of October, or any other time shorter or longer than the 1st of January next, could not move to amend the bill in that particular, because the Senate will have inserted the words "from and after the passage of this act." I think I am right in that. Therefore, if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky prevails, it settles the question that the act shall take effect from and after its passage.

If, on the other hand, the motion indicated by the Senator from Indiana were made and should prevail, to strike out the words in parenthesis, then it would be competent for the Senate to insert any other words that the Senate should see fit to insert, as, for instance, the 1st of October next or the 1st of September next or the 1st of November next, or any other words. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be better for the Senator from Kentucky not to press his amendment, but to allow the amendment indicated by the Senator from Indiana to be made, and if that should prevail and the words in parenthesis should be stricken out, then it would be competent for the Senate to amend by inserting any other words fixing any day that the Senate may please for the taking effect of the act. If no time be fixed at all, then, as a matter of course, the act will take effect from its approval by the President.

Mr. McDONALD. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky has the effect that has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio then I prefer it to the one that I intended to suggest. As I believe the bankrupt law ought to be repealed and that its repeal ought to take effect immediately, I am unwilling, so far as I am concerned, to fix any day in the future for its taking effect, because in my judgment it is simply postponing business, at least so far as new business is concerned, until that day shall arrive. I think the impression has gone abroad over the country in reference to the effect of the bankrupt law upon the business interests of the country, especially as to new business, as to the revival of enterprise, has become so fixed that it becomes a matter of necessity that if the law is repealed at all it should be repealed so as to take effect at once. In support of that proposition I desire to have read a telegram which I received this morning from a number of the citizens of one of the chief commercial towns in my State. I ask that their statement in regard to the matter be read from the desk. It fully meets my own views upon the question. Therefore, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky has the effect of settling the question by its adoption so that the passage of this act is to be upon the terms that it shall take effect immediately upon its being signed by the President, I prefer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the communication called for.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

FORT WAYNE, INDIANA, May 4, 1878.

To Hon. Senator JOSEPH E. McDONALD,
Washington, D. C.:

Believing as we do, which belief is not theoretical but based on our own knowledge as wholesale merchants, bankers, and business men of Fort Wayne, Indiana, of its practical workings, that the present bankrupt law has been one of the chief causes of our country's present financial embarrassment, and that should it continue to remain in force it will work ruin to our country if it does not make us a nation of bankrupts, we therefore beg of you to exert every effort in your power for the immediate repeal, to take effect on its passage, of the existing bankrupt law.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I made the motion I did, to strike out and insert, hoping and believing that it would have the effect indicated by the Senator from Ohio; and the Senator from Indiana concurs fully in all the reasons I could give why the repeal should take effect immediately, and therefore I shall adhere to the motion in its present form.

Mr. THURMAN. In order that the Senate may not be concluded by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, which will shut the door and lock it, as it is in order to move to amend the text before a motion to strike out is put, I move to strike out "January" and insert "October" and to strike out "nine" in line 34 and insert "eight," so that it will read:

Which shall be on the 1st day of October, A. D. 1878.

Mr. EATON and others. Make it September.

Mr. THURMAN. I will put it at September at the suggestion of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] and perhaps that is the stronger motion. I move to strike out "January" and insert "September," and to strike out "nine" and insert "eight" so that the act shall take effect on the 1st of September next.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, the Senate presents a strange attitude toward this bill and the subject of bankruptcy. Every one who has spoken on the subject has conceded, without qualification, the necessity for a bankrupt law in this country, and yet it is proposed to repeal this one absolutely and substitute nothing for it. It really seems to me that that is not very consistent action. If such a law is necessary, logically, Congress ought to reform and amend the existing law. The difficulty is that those who insist upon immediate repeal do not take a distinction between a necessary law, very imperfect in some of its provisions and badly administered, and no law at all. That the country needs a well-devised bankrupt law is beyond any sort of question; and what we ought to do, it seems to me, is to endeavor to perfect the existing one, instead of leaving the country without any at all. After the existence of this law for so long a time, and at a time when such a law is so necessary for the benefit of the whole country at this time of business disaster, it does seem to me that there ought to be some reasonable notice of the time when the existing law shall be repealed, so that those who are in embarrassed circumstances may have an opportunity to adapt themselves to that state of things which will exist after the law shall cease to operate.

My distinguished colleague the other day adverted to a special state of circumstances in our State that makes the bankrupt law specially interesting there now. He did not magnify the state of distress there; it prevails from one end of the State to the other, and we cannot be otherwise than seriously impressed with the absolute importance of extending the time within which this act must be abolished as long as possible.

Telegrams have been sent here in large numbers this morning from the creditor class of the country for the purpose of influencing the action of the Senate. Why, sir, I wish I had arranged a number of letters I have received within the last three or four days on this subject, to read to the Senate as a striking set-off to these telegrams which have been sent here this morning to serve such a purpose. I happen to have by me a letter which I now beg to read to show the state of things in the locality of my State from which this letter comes:

CLINTON, NORTH CAROLINA, May 2, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Our people are greatly distressed in consequence of the recent homestead decision, and confidently trust that you will continue to resist the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law, and save them, if possible, from utter ruin, and many from almost absolute beggary. I write this short communication at the earnest solicitation of many of my countrymen.

With great respect, I am, yours, most respectfully,

M. C. RICHARDSON.

Hon. A. S. MERRIMON.

Mr. Richardson is a highly respectable gentleman, living at the town of Clinton. He would not state anything that was not strictly true as he states and believes it to be.

Let me restate the condition of things in North Carolina and why such a great and pressing necessity exists there at this moment. The constitution of North Carolina, which was adopted in 1868, provided a homestead equal in value to a thousand dollars and a personal property exemption to the amount of $500, which should in all cases be exempt from execution. The supreme court of North Carolina, in a case which presented the question, decided that that homestead provision operated retroactively and that it protected the owner of the homestead against debts contracted before the adoption of the constitution providing it. That court repeatedly reaffirmed this decision. The people generally confided implicitly in it as deciding the law correctly. Lately a case was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, the same having been brought up from the supreme court of North Carolina by writ of error, in which the same question was presented, and the Supreme Court here reversed the decision of the supreme court of North Carolina. The result is that hundreds of people, poor people with large and helpless families, who have but a homestead and the personal-property exemption, are turned over to the mercy of their creditors whose debts were contracted before the adoption of the constitution in 1868.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Has not the State of North Carolina a statute of limitations of six years against ordinary debts?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I was so informed.

Mr. MERRIMON. The statute of limitations in North Carolina for debts not under seal is three years, but as to single bonds the statute presumes that the debt is paid after ten years, but that presumption may be rebutted. But in most cases there is another difficulty in the way. The great majority of the debts that were contracted before the adoption of the constitution in 1868 have been reduced to judgments, and such judgments are not discharged. I stated in a communication to one of the newspapers in my State that in a single county more than four hundred creditors had gone into the clerk's office and had ordered notice to issue to the debtor with a view to revive the judgments and obtain execution upon which the homesteads of the debtor could be sold.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will.

Mr. KERNAN. How will it aid your people if the bankrupt law continues six months?

Mr. MERRIMON. It will aid them in this way very plainly if the exemption clause in the bankrupt law is valid: if this class of debtors should go into voluntary bankruptcy there will be set apart to them the homestead allowed by the law of the State constitution, and this will save the homestead and other exemptions if the law is valid. The law on its face plainly allows the exemption.

Mr. KERNAN. Will it be a uniform constitutional system of bankruptcy which says that the States, after the passage of the law and after debts are contracted, may, each one, say one, "we will exempt $5,000," another "$1,500," and so on, and will that be a good bankrupt law? Would not the courts hold void any such thing?

Mr. MERRIMON. This allowance of homestead by the constitution and statutes of North Carolina was anterior to the passage of this provision of the statute of the United States to which I refer; so that the difficulty the Senator suggests cannot arise. It is expressly provided in the statutes of the United States that this homestead exemption in the constitution of North Carolina and like exemptions in every other State constitution, and by the statutes of the several States, shall be good against all debts contracted anterior to the time the homestead was allowed, and they are expressly within the terms of the act of Congress.

Mr. KERNAN. I want to know whether Congress, under pretense of making a uniform system of bankruptcy, can allow every State to exempt all property if it sees fit.

Mr. MERRIMON. That question was raised before the courts soon after this provision of the statutes of the United States was adopted, and it was contended that inasmuch as there was one measure of exemption in North Carolina, another in Georgia, and another in New York, therefore it was not uniform in view of the Constitution of the United States; but the courts have repeatedly held that the provision of the Constitution did not refer to uniformity in that view, but in an entirely different one, and the courts have uniformly given the law effect; so that if one of these citizens in North Carolina owning a homestead, and but a homestead, shall go into bankruptcy, the court will be obliged to allot to him that homestead to which he is entitled by the constitution of North Carolina. That will save the debtor's home for his wife and his little ones; he will not be turned out of doors and driven to despair and beggary.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is whether under the law of North Carolina there is now any homestead exemption as against these old debts he refers to?

Mr. MERRIMON. The Supreme Court have held that the provision of the constitution of North Carolina which allowed the homestead was not operative as against the debts contracted anterior to the adoption of the constitution.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Then if there is no law of North Carolina creating a homestead against these old debts, how can the provisions of the bankrupt law create an exemption that does not exist in the laws of North Carolina?

Mr. MERRIMON. In this way: the homestead provision as the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent decision of Edwards vs. Kersey, made about ten days ago, have decided that the homestead provision of the constitution of North Carolina is operative as against debts contracted after its adoption, but it is not operative as to debts contracted anterior to that time.

Now, let us see what would be the state of the case if a citizen owning a homestead should go into bankruptcy after the decision of that case. He would be entitled to a homestead certainly as to debts created after the adoption of the constitution providing the homestead exemption. There is no question about that. I maintain that whenever a homestead is allowed, then, under the operation of the broad language of this statute, it operates as to all debts—for debts created anterior to that time are expressly mentioned in the statutes. I will call attention to it more particularly directly. But, in the next place, when we look at the spirit of the bankruptcy act, of the clause bearing on this subject, it is manifest that the purpose of Congress in passing this law was to use the measure of homestead exemption in the several States simply as a measure for the allowance that should be set apart to the debtor when he should invoke the aid of this law in bankruptcy. So that practically the question suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire does not exist.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to the broad provision of the statute on this subject. There can be no question that the language of the statute does and was intended to exempt the homestead from debts created before it was allowed as well as those created after it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. By general understanding, at one o'clock the bill (H. R No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency, was to come before the Senate, on which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] has the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. With the leave of the Senator from Georgia I move that the pending order be postponed in order that we may proceed with the bankrupt bill. If that motion prevails, I will immediately agree that the bankrupt bill may be laid aside temporarily so that the Senator may proceed to address the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. With that understanding I have no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Appropriations is ready to proceed with two general appropriation bills and is very anxious to have an opportunity to present them to the attention of the Senate. Neither of these bills will take any great length of time.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the pending order be postponed and that we continue the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Now I consent that it be laid aside informally and that the resumption-repeal act be taken up that the Senator from Georgia may make his speech.

Mr. SARGENT. It is also understood that after the Senator from Georgia concludes the appropriation bills shall be considered.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly I have no objection to that.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, if the proposition I am about to submit could be tried by rules of evidence as stringent as those applied in courts of justice, we should not only demonstrate the wisdom of some such measure as that proposed by the Finance Committee, but do more I think to settle this financial controversy in one month than we have in years. With a desire to avoid mere speculations upon such a subject and to cite only undeniable facts, I shall seek to make good this single proposition: that ill-advised legislation is the prime cause of our financial depression to-day.

During the last ten years the pressure of party questions, if it has not warped the opinions of Senators, has at least prevented full and dispassionate consideration of this great problem of finance. From this or some other cause, we have written, I think, in financial legislation a most frightful chapter. I am strongly tempted to say, for I believe it can be demonstrated, that no more dismal chapter, nor one more inconsistent with real statesmanship, nor more incompatible with the true interests of its citizens has ever been written in any country where the ballot was allowed.

What, sir, will strike the candid inquirer as the most conspicuous facts connected with that chapter? We found the country for some years after the war full of progress and of strength. One section of it, the conquering section, was in a condition, not merely of seeming but of absolute prosperity. The late Vice-President, then a Senator from the great State of Massachusetts, stated in this Chamber in 1868 that the Northern States, notwithstanding their war losses, had increased their wealth by the enormous sum of $3,000,000,000. The other section, although desolated by war, was gradually recovering from its losses and regaining its strength. This, sir, is a plain, truthful statement, I think, of the condition of this country for some years after the war. Let me repeat it, for it is a very essential factor in deciding the truth or fallacy of the proposition submitted. One section of the country absolutely abounded in all the evidences of a genuine prosperity; the other, although it had lost more than $5,000,000,000 of its property, was slowly but steadily and hopefully reorganizing its disordered husbandry and regaining its industrial independence.

Never, sir, never, did any country after such a war present such evidences of recuperative capacities and such a basis for hope of future wealth and progress as did this country at that time. Unfortunately for the country our legislators refused to profit by that lesson of wisdom taught by the practical business men of France, who, when applied to by a distinguished writer upon financial theories to know what he could do to help on the general prosperity, replied in that celebrated answer, "Let us alone." "Let us alone." Our legislators, on the honest assumption doubtless that this growth was unhealthful, refused to "let us alone," but began to cut back the tree that had borne all the fruit. In order to assure success in that direction we borrowed for the purpose Peel's pruning-knife which had so effectually done its deadly work in England, and we have mercilessly used it ever since. We lopped off here a paper legal-tender branch and there a silver legal-tender branch; we cut and we pruned until we have succeeded in producing a crop just abundant enough to feed the few and tantalize, if not starve, the many. We proceeded, I say, on the assumption that all of this seeming prosperity was a sham, that there was nothing real in it, that this increased number of land-holders, these improved lands, this busy population, this well-paid labor, this hum of machinery, these loaded trains thundering along all our railways, these growing cities with their boulevards and banks and brown-stone fronts, these mines disgorging their wealth, these blazing furnaces, these millions of homes earned and paid for by the well-employed workingmen of the country, these homes filled with plenty and around whose doorways universal contentment smiled—all, all we said, are a delusive sham, the fungous outgrowth of an irredeemable, dishonored paper currency, and we would have none of it!

So, with a total misapprehension apparently of the effect of our laws, or led by the hope of some party advantage, or, what was worse, following the delusive phantom of improving our condition by contracting the circulating medium, the very life current of business, we hurried through one enactment after another until, as I shall be able to show, by sheer legislation alone we have brought all these well-grounded hopes, inspiring prospects, and productive energies of a progressive and self-reliant people to one vast funeral pile.

Sir, what reasons were assigned, what excuses given for any legislative interference in the condition of affairs succeeding the war? It was not pretended that the country refused to grow and needed a legislative spur in its side to move it onward, for at no period of our history had there been so rapid an advancement. It was not pretended that wealth was concentrating in the hands of a few and that a legislative check was therefore required; for never under any circumstances did wealth so generally distribute itself among all classes of our population. It was not pretended that the country was in perpetual danger of being flooded with the irredeemable issues of irresponsible bank officers to-day and denuded of them to-morrow by a withdrawal of their discounts, thus organizing ruin in the back offices of their banks; for no such condition of affairs existed. It was not even pretended that the depreciation of the currency was due solely to a redundancy of its volume, at least no such pretense could be sustained with reason; for there stood the changeless, recorded facts to dispute any such assumption. There stood the fact that during the war your currency scaled upward or downward as your great armies advanced or retreated, as the confidence of the people increased or diminished in the power of the Government to restore to its integrity the American Union. There stood the fact that your currency, in July, 1868, reached, I think, 285, and in September following fell to 189, with a large increase of volume. There stood the additional fact—and let me say in passing that no ingenuity can explain away their significance, no human power, and, be it said with all reverence, no Divine power can destroy them, for they were past, accomplished facts; there they stood and there they stand to-day—the fact that again and again since the war has gold advanced with a decrease of the volume of currency or fallen with an increase.

What excuse, then, I ask again, was given for any legislative tinkering in so satisfactory a condition of affairs? Here is the answer: "A return to honest finance through forced resumption by a contraction of the circulating medium." Well, Mr. President, I favor honest finance, I favor a return to specie payments. In all I have said or written, before my entrance into this body and since, I have steadfastly maintained that the country should reach specie payments at the earliest practicable moment, compatible always with our great industrial interests.

But before going into an analysis of each step in this legislation, I wish to make this one general remark: we have been returning to honest finance by that road for some time. We have not yet reached the end of it, for although we have equalized the currency, the experiment will never be tested until we have determined whether under our circumstances it be possible to maintain actual redemption without utter destruction of the business interests of this country. I say, therefore, we have not reached the end of the experiment, but we have left our monuments to tell to posterity the events which signalized our progress. They are mournful, but instructive; broken merchants, broken miners, broken manufacturers, broken savings-banks, broken insurance companies, shattered fortunes, dismay among the people, blight universal and deadly; and, sir, what is more appalling still, these dreadful events increase day by day; these black ruins multiply and grow blacker the farther and farther we go on this wrong road to a rightful end.

But, sir, I wish to examine with some particularity each step in the history of this legislation and show its effect on the business interests of this country. In his annual report of December 4, 1865, Mr. Hugh McCulloch, the then Secretary of the Treasury, now English banker, announced the astounding purpose of an utter destruction of all the currency known as United States legal-tender notes. Here is his language:

> The work of retiring the notes which have been issued should be commenced without delay and carefully and persistently continued until all are retired.

The Congress resolved upon co-operation. A resolution declaring this purpose passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 144 to 6, only six men out of a total of one hundred and fifty protesting by their votes against the absolute destruction of this currency. Pursuant to that policy, the Congress, in April, 1866, resolved that the Secretary should retire ten millions in six months and not more than four millions in any one month thereafter. This, Mr. President, was the first step in the process of contraction by legislative enactment. Did or did it not damage the business interests of the country?

Sir, we have been told over and over again that legislation had dealt no blows at our industry; that irredeemable paper money, war losses, overproductions, or some other cause had brought ruin upon the country; but that, whatever else might have contributed, no share of the awful responsibility rested upon legislation. Such is the testimony of theory, but what is the evidence? What were the consequences of this first act of contraction? Let the facts speak and let theory be silent that it may learn!

What are the facts? I will not answer in my own words nor in the words of either of the six men who protested against the policy, nor in the language of any man who was then, is now, or ever has been accused of opposing contraction. I prefer to give the answer in the language of a known contractionist; of a man who during the war was chairman of the subcommittee on Finance in the House; who is now, I believe, a leading banker in the State of New York. What does Mr. Spaulding say were the direct, ascertained, acknowledged consequences of this first act of legislative interference?

As contraction gradually went on money became more in demand.

"Money became more in demand;" that is, greater stringency in the money market and increased embarrassments in business. Is that an indication of improved prosperity promised by the advocates of this policy? Is it not—I put it to the candid judgment of the Senate—an infallible index, pointing with unerring certainty to impending financial disaster? He continues:

It soon became unpopular with a large class of the community. Members of Congress very soon changed their opinions on the subject.

Members of Congress! How many of them? Did members of Congress abandon this "true theory?" Did they discover their mistake? Did they acknowledge it? Let us see:

Members of Congress very soon changed their opinions on the subject, and in January, 1868—

Less than two years thereafter—

a law was passed declaring that from and after its passage the Secretary of the Treasury should retire no more of these notes.

Mr. President, this law denied to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to contract, which Congress two years before had granted. It was a direct reversal of its former policy. Yet it passed the House of Representatives, composed largely of the same men, without a dissenting vote. It passed the Senate with only four dissenting votes. What, were these contractionists, these advocates of legislative interference, forced in so short a time to change front and to swap sides with their opponents in the scales which tried the relative soundness of their respective views? Can it be that this first act of legislative intermeddling proved so disastrous as to force an entire Congress to change its opinions. Had the policy of contraction no advocates left in a Congress which less than two years previous contained one hundred and forty-four of its defenders against six of its opponents? Sir, it seems to me that little else need be added to this argument after citing this convincing proof that so limited a contraction had in so short a time produced so great distress as to force a whole Congress to sign its own condemnation and record its solemn judgment by vote against the folly and the madness of its former policy. Sir, I do not believe that in all legislative history a parallel can be found to the fact or the cause of this conspicuous and sudden revulsion. Mr. President, were I to stop here it seems to me I should have established the truth of the proposition submitted. What reply can advocates of contraction make? Standing as they do over the dead body of one of their cherished theories, slaughtered in the combat with experience, and covered all over with disaster and defeat, is it too much to suggest that they be somewhat tolerant of the opinions of their opponents whose warnings were unheeded, whose arguments are unanswered, whose facts cannot be disputed, and whose apprehensions the mournful record of subsequent events has elevated into the dignity of prophecy?

We shall continue our instruction by a few lessons from the second chapter of this financial legislation. The contraction screw which in 1866 had received its first turn into the lid of that coffin, which since has encased the dead body of many an industry, was checked in 1868 only because the prospective corpse on the inside refused to lie down in peace under the pressure. The people protested. From every section they protested. From East and South and North and West they sent their Representatives back to the Congress with instructions to undo the mad legislation which they had perpetrated upon the country two years before. Did those legislators heed that instruction? Where is the Representative from any section, North, East, South, or West, who in 1868 refused to heed the voice of the people? Is there one member of the House, fresh from the people, who refused to condemn by his vote the unwisdom of that policy? No, not one.

But the screw was only checked. It was not broken. The law of 1869, in order to settle disputed questions and interpretations, declared in substance that the bonds and the "greenbacks" should be paid in coin, gold and silver. It would seem that this ought to have satisfied all the demands of public honor, public faith, and public credit. But not so. The screw was to have one more turn, one of these metals was to be demonetized, silver was to be decapitated, and all values were to rest upon a single metal. The $1,600,000,000 of Government obligations and the $6,000,000,000 of private and corporate debts and all values were to be represented by the scarcest, the dearest, the most unobtainable article ever used for currency in all the earth—an article which we have not in sufficient quantities for any such purpose, which we cannot get, and which we could not keep if we had. Keep gold, sir, under our circumstances in sufficient quantities to redeem the currency necessary for this country! Keep gold, with our foreign indebtedness absorbing the products of our mines and our industries dead! Keep gold, with every unusual demand from Europe sweeping it from us! Sir, you can no more do this than you could stay the Great Eastern in mid-ocean in a storm by casting its anchor on a passing cloud.

I only refer, however, to this act of demonetization in order to take up each link in the chapter of legislation which I am pursuing, but as Congress and the country has passed judgment upon it I dismiss it without further remark.

I could heartily wish that this were the last act to which it is my duty to refer in this discussion. But not so.

Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more.

This time the purpose is to pass a general resumption law, with a day fixed by Congress. It is put before the country with the captivating title of specie payments and free banking. It is certain that that bill meant when in the Senate one thing to the contractionists and another thing to the inflationists. As I was neither a contractionist nor an inflationist I did not support it. A code of conservatism in four words—"let well enough alone"—embraced, I thought, the true doctrines on this subject after the war. Doubtless many Senators and Representatives voted for this resumption bill, believing there could be no further contraction under that clause of the bill which provided that $100 of national-bank notes should be issued for every $80 of United States notes retired. It was certain, however, that under that other clause, which forced all the banks as well as the United States Treasury to prepare for resumption upon a certain day, contraction must occur.

Before speaking of the effect of this law upon the business interests of the country, I wish to mention one or two very notable facts connected with it. A progress from the purpose of total destruction of United States notes to a recognition by a majority of both Houses of Congress of the necessity of three hundred and fifty millions of that currency for the business of the country was certainly an indication of improving financial wisdom among our law-makers, and as I wish to be both generous and just I will mention another significant fact: we found instead of six men a majority of both Houses of Congress voting against retiring all these notes. Indeed, I think I might say that it was a progress from six to absolute unanimity, for I believe the last of the cromators, like the last of the antediluvians, has passed from the earth. I think no man could now be found who would stand up in the face of our experience and advocate a total destruction of the United States notes.

But with all these encouraging facts connected with it that law has been productive, I think, of a greater contraction of the currency and consequently greater damage to the country than any other law upon our statute-books. I do not mean that it has lessened so much the currency nominally in existence; what I mean is, that it has contracted the currency in active circulation and withdrawn it from business just as effectually as if locked in the vaults of the Treasury. It has contracted the use of money in active business by encouraging the hoarding of greenbacks, by compelling bankers to retire their notes to prepare for resumption, by discouraging manufactures, and, lastly and most disastrously, by destroying all confidence in the ability of enterprise to live through such an ordeal.

Mr. President, all these results were foreseen and foretold. The proof of what must happen under such a condition of affairs was everywhere to be found. Here was the acknowledgment of Spaulding as to the result of the first act of contraction. Here were the records reeking with the havoc dealt by Peel's similar bill to English industry. Here were the disasters which were acknowledged in our country by the first Congress that met after this policy was inaugurated. Here was the declaration of at least one great historian that on the tomb of the greatest empire of antiquity, together with the four causes of its fall given by Gibbon, another should be recorded, which I give in my own language: "Died of a contraction of her circulating medium, which she was too wise to seek but powerless to prevent." Here was all history burdened with the proofs of the indiscriminate murder by this policy wherever enforced of every interest which makes a country great and rich.

But we are told, Mr. President, in answer to all this, that true finance teaches that no country can be permanently prosperous until it has reached specie payments. Let that be granted. Upon that another assumption, which I think utterly untrue, is founded, that the shortest road therefore is the best road and that contraction is that road and must be traveled, however thorny, rough, and ruinous.

Now, let us see how it was proposed to reach specie payments prior to the passage of the silver bill. The first step was to declare gold the only basis for credits or values. As this base was too small, it was not proposed to add to it silver or Government credit, but to compress the superstructure to the size of this base—to limit the silver, contract the paper, cramp the industries, squeeze all things until they would rest on this base. This is precisely what we have been doing for ten years. Let me, sir, describe the structure we are building. At the base an insufficient supply of the circulating medium and consequent high rate of interest; above that, increased demand, in the language of Spaulding, for money, stress in business, and general failures. Above that, discharged laborers, hordes of idlers, breakers of the peace. Above that, the air filled with the clamors of discontent from a whole people in distress. Is that an overdrawn picture of the actual results from such legislation? What was said of the condition of Great Britain after the adoption of a similar policy? Sir James Graham said "such a scene of agricultural and commercial distress" as followed "was never before witnessed." Mr. Charles Knight describes it as "the paralysis of industry" producing attempts at plunder, incendiary fires, rebellions of hunger ("the belly") put down by the military.

Mr. Brand, from his place in Parliament, spoke of "the poor abandoning their homes, of deserted parishes, of crowds of paupers, increasing as they went and spreading wider and wider the awful desolation." A philanthropic association of Londoners described the distress and misery "as more general and extreme than that ever produced by earthquakes, inundations, famine, pestilence, or war with all its concomitants."

Mr. President, what answer do the contractionists make to the fearful indictment of these dreadful facts? They admit that great distresses followed the inauguration of this policy, but deny the responsibility of that policy. The calamitous events which followed in this country and England they claim were mere concomitants, the accidental coincidences of their measures. I charge that these disasters in both countries are the consequences of their policy; they deny; and thus the issue is joined. I believe the most competent and overwhelming proof can be adduced to sustain the charge. But suppose I am mistaken in this.

Suppose I can only demonstrate that such enactments are always followed, or even usually followed, by such calamities. Is it the part of enlightened statesmanship to pursue a policy in dealing with a country's greatest interests, which is always, or even usually, followed by great disasters, and then justify it on the ground that you cannot establish absolutely the relation between the legislation and ensuing events, as cause and effect? Is that statesmanship? Sir, the vaster the interests involved, the more inexcusable any legislation, the results of which are in the least problematical. The power to destroy a people by a complete control over its money is as absolute and extreme as the collateral power, the control over the sword. Indeed, I believe, sir, that it is more absolute, for when a ruler draws the sword against his subjects they catch its first gleam and can prepare, if need be, for resistance; but a willful misuse of the power over the circulating medium or a mere misapprehension as to the effect of the policy pursued is not to be met by armed resistance, and works its damage in ways so silent and by steps so stealthy that the people are unaware of the danger until they are overwhelmed in disaster. When a government, sir, arrogates to itself the absolute control over the entire volume of circulating medium, it assumes a power over the labor and property of its citizens too vast and fearful to be exercised except in directions which experience has demonstrated can bring good and only good to its people.

Mr. President, have Senators contemplated the nature of the power we here exert? It is one thing to settle by constitutional provision general policies and leave to States and communities the power to decide the volume of currency needed. It is a vastly different thing for Congress to assume the high prerogative of deciding the exact number of dollars forty-five millions of people, scattered over a great continent, with their varied and ramified interests, shall use day by day in the transaction of their business.

Sir, we touch here in Washington, in this Capitol, a vital cord which is felt thrilling through every household from ocean to ocean. There is not an enterprise, there is not an interest, there is not a community, there is not a household unaffected, there is not a child born beneath the flag whose education and interest and destiny are not wrapped up in our legislation upon this great question. Senators discuss this subject as though the faith of the Government was the chief question involved, as though the protection of the credit of the Government was the most exalted end to which statesmanship can aspire. Sir, the credit of the Government must be sustained; it is a high duty to protect it; but the means of protection are of great simplicity. The credit of the Government will take care of itself if we but see to it that the interest on the bonds is paid at the time and in the coin designated in the contract. Important as it is, it sinks by reason of its simplicity into utter nothingness as compared with other momentous and infinite interests, interests which involve not only the welfare of society and civilization of the present, but the well-being of generations yet unborn.

These are the interests that should enlist our sympathies, command our thoughts, arouse our solicitude, in all our discussions upon this financial subject. No hyperbole can exaggerate their importance, and no extreme of caution can sufficiently measure the prudence and hesitation with which we should adopt, in reference to them, a policy; nay, let me rather say that no language is strong enough to describe the loathing and the horror with which we should turn from a policy which by possibility could be responsible for the irreparable damages to these great interests. If, then, it be true that cautious and enlightened statesmanship would refuse to exercise this delicate power over the circulating medium, except when beneficial results are assured, what is to be said of the temerity of the law-maker who would persist in a policy which can be proven to be the cause of the evil?

Now, sir, I propose to prove by overwhelming proofs not only that there is no reasonable ground for denying the responsibility of legislation for the disasters in this country and in England, but that legislation is solely responsible.

We adopted the policy of contraction. Prior to that the country was prosperous. Immediately money became as Spaulding said in greater demand, business was distressed, labor lost its employment, ruin ensued. How was it in England? She contracted one-half. Immediately wages fell one-half, cotton fell one-half, wool fell one-half, iron fell one-half, lands fell one-half, and ruin and woe and universal distress were the legacy left by Peel and his associates for more than a generation to their country. Do you ask for proofs that these disasters would not have befallen these countries under a different policy? Then look just across the English Channel. There stands France. She, too, had a great war, a war which though short was decisive and apparently crushing. How is it that none of these disasters has befallen her industries or her people? Had she natural advantages above those of the United States or England? Not at all. Had she a stable political government which was denied to England or the United States? The reverse is true. She had lost a large portion of her domain; the Prussian guns had scarcely ceased their roar around her capital; her emperor was in exile; her former government was overthrown; her political institutions were in a transition state; one day the dynasty of Napoleon, the next the torch and the blood of the commune; then the rickety republic rising upon the ruins of the former government, and her whole social and political fabric convulsed by successive shocks of internal dissensions. Yet in spite of them all, out of them all, came France, and established for herself and her people an industrial prosperity and financial pre-eminence unrivaled in the world.

Mr. President, how were results so marvelous and so beneficent so speedily and so permanently secured? Was it by following what is termed "the true theory of finance," the policy pursued by this country and by Great Britain? Is that the road which France marched to her proud pre-eminence in the industrial and financial empire of the world? Nay, sir, nay; but guided by a better light, founding her faith on the doctrine universally recognized by all writers upon practical economy that the wealth of a nation rests in the productive energies of its people, she encouraged and stimulated these not by contracting the tools with which her population was to work, but by adding to their number. Her bank-notes at the beginning of the war were $288,000,000. The first report after the war shows an increase to $442,000,000. Had France been England, had she been governed by an American Congress, what would have been her course? She would have resolved immediately that $442,000,000 were irredeemable, that it was a dishonored currency, that the process of retiring must be at once begun, and, in the language of Secretary McCulloch, "persistently continued until all are retired." France would have had her one hundred and forty-four contractionists to six opponents in her legislative assembly; and although like our Congress she might have seen her mistake two years later and condemned the policy as we did after trial by unanimous vote, yet devoted to the theory she would have returned to it again with the zeal which marked our return, and having scattered the same seed, she would have long since reaped the same harvest of death. But what course did France pursue? The war ended in May, 1871. In December thereafter she authorized an increase from $442,000,000 to $560,000,000. She did not stop at that, but authorized in May, 1872, an additional increase to $640,000,000.

Mr. President, if it were insanity to have opposed contraction in this country, what ought to be said of the statesmen of France who not only opposed contraction but in twelve months after the war nearly doubled her currency? This was the method of France for reaching specie resumption, paying her debt, giving life to her business and energy to her people. Where is the Senator who in the face of these facts has the temerity to deny that this policy was conducive to the wonderful recuperation of France? Where is the practical business man who in the gloom of our distress would not prefer for his country the policy of France, resting its claims on the adamant of common sense and experience with unrivaled success, to that of England resting its claims on the quicksands of theoretic assumption, with universal failure? I repeat the question, who can deny that this financial policy of France contributed to her rapid recuperation?

If that is disputed, turn to the kingdom of Italy. She, too, had a great war and by reason of her losses and the withdrawal of her coin by foreign creditors her circulation was reduced until her people were brought to the very verge of general bankruptcy. In 1866, however, she issued a full supply of paper money—government notes. A distinguished Italian author is my authority for the magical change which occurred in Italy. Mines were opened; manufactories sprang up; railroads were built; lands advanced; labor was employed; agriculture flourished; population increased; her deserted Emilian fields were repopulated, and universal thrift and contentment were seen throughout all her borders.

Now, Mr. President, group together these facts, and what lesson do they teach? England under one policy and universal ruin; France under a different policy and universal thrift. Here is the United States under the policy of contraction, and immediately the busy wheels of her industry stand still, dismay seizes and languor depresses the energies of the youngest, the strongest, and the most self-reliant people upon earth. Italy pursues a different policy, and that grey-headed old land lifts herself from the dust of a thousand years, shakes off her native lethargy, and moves forward with the energy of youth. Sir, what does all this mean? Are these facts worth nothing in this argument? Are they to be condemned and silenced by the assumptions of theory? Where is the answer to them? Here are two kingdoms and two republics under different policies: the kingdom of England and the kingdom of Italy; the Republic of France and the Republic of America. Two kingdoms and the two republics stand before us the unimpeached and unimpeachable witnesses of the great truth I am seeking to enforce.

One more argument on this point. It is worth something in this discussion that the results of the policy of contraction were foreseen and foretold in both England and America by men of brain, intelligence and learning, and practical experience. When Peel's bill to which I have referred was pending in the British Parliament the bank directors entered and recorded their solemn protest against its passage, and warned the Parliament that if that bill was passed it "would compel them to put upon the business of the country a relentless pressure, to foresee and estimate the consequences of which was impossible." In this country from 1865 to the consummation of these disasters, like predictions of like results were made with equal emphasis. It was predicted as early as 1865 that "with the policy of contraction retrogression would begin;" that it would "produce bankruptcy and ruin," that such a "policy by the Government was to commit financial suicide;" that "it would lead to demoralization and degradation with all their attendant ills;" that "the Government would thus annihilate by its own hand the industry and the prosperity of its people." It is certainly worth something in this argument that every prophecy of improvement under their policy made by the contractionists has proved utterly false, and all the predictions of evil made by the opponents of that policy have been more than realized.

But what was all this worth? What was prophecy, what was argument, what was history, what were facts and experience worth to those who had already settled in advance that it was sheer lunacy to talk of prosperity until we had reached specie payments, and that contraction was the shortest and best road to resumption? There was the theory, and that theory was the plummet which was to try not only the value of all suggestions but of all experience, and the truth of history as well. Did history and experience conflict with this theory, then "experience and history are insane." How are you going to convince the Sadducees by proofs that Christ rose from the dead, when according to their theory "the dead rise not?"

Mr. President, a good deal has been said about the lunacy of those who favored the silver bill. I do not know that I should have felt called upon to refer to this but for the fact that some of these criticisms have been read in this Chamber and placed upon its files; and even now whatever I may say will be said with the utmost good humor, for I think that those who thought they saw in this policy of contraction nothing of good but everything of evil and dared to say so, and whose predictions have ripened into prophecy, can afford to sit down with some degree of complacency under such imputations.

Lunacy, Mr. President, is a very bad disease, especially when it possesses law-makers; but I believe it is true that in all other spheres of human action except in legislating upon finance those men were not considered the lunatics who saw the danger before them and would have avoided it. I have known very good generals who, although devoted to tactics, as these gentlemen are to theory, thought it wiser sometimes to suffer a breach of tactics rather than the defeat involved in their observance. I have known other generals, and they were not lunatics, at least they were not so considered, who, when an important position was to be stormed, thought it wise rather than charge directly in front of the guns to approach by other lines, though longer, which insured the capture of the stronghold without the sacrifice of the army. I infer, however, that in moving upon the fortress of resumption the true theory is to march straight to the front, over the bastions of debt and the abattis of bankruptcies into the fort, and then to congratulate the country on the brilliant achievement and on the fact that, although we have nearly destroyed it, we have left life enough in the old land yet to enable it to recover from the losses some time within the next half century. [Laughter.]

Well, Mr. President, of all the lessons ever required at my hands, that is the most difficult for me to learn. It may be scientific, it may be good theory; but it is very bad practice, and I have been utterly unable to understand why it should be considered so much less statesman-like to save the country by the rules of common sense rather than send it to perdition according to science. I am unable to see why salvation by experience is so much less desirable than damnation according to Ricardo. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

I have said, and said truly, I think, that not one of the prophecies made by the contractionists had been fulfilled; that experience had demonstrated the correctness of every one made by their opponents. Now, sir, I close what I had to say on the subject of lunacy with one remark. An English nobleman of the party of Fox once said, speaking of the predictions of Edmund Burke in reference to the French revolution, every one of which was realized, that they were the "ebullitions of a brilliant lunatic." The reply was in point and very suggestive in this connection: "insane or inspired, fate seemed determined to make of Burke an uncommonly good prophet." Fate does seem determined to make of these anti-contractionists most excellent prophets.

Mr. President, what claim is set up for this policy of contraction? To what beneficial results do its advocates point? In what have the people profited? Cui bono? What section, what class has been made the richer by it? None, none save one—only one.

We had at the end of the war about $47 per capita. That was not considered too much for France. If it was too much for this country, there was no necessity certainly for legislating on the subject, for by the very nature of a large portion of our circulation it must be retired in a short time. Besides, at the rate of increase of former years our population would reach in 1880 fifty-six and a half millions, in 1890 seventy-six millions and a half, thus reducing the per capita one-half without withdrawing one dollar of circulation. But we suddenly contracted when the South came in denuded of all currency, when the Territories were being organized into States, when we had a great debt upon us, when every muscle and every fiber of the country's brain-power ought to have been strengthened and stimulated into additional activity. We incased the country in a great metallic jacket and drew it tighter and tighter until the life-blood has almost ceased to flow.

But we are asked if legislation caused this distress how was it that the disasters did not follow immediately after the contraction in 1868, 1869, and 1870. The answer strengthens the proposition. It is impossible to estimate what will be the result of measures in a great country like this, sometimes for years or a series of years after their enactment. This legislation was like the seeds of consumption planted in the lungs of a strong man: at first his native vigor would resist the progress of the disease; then one lung is gone, the hectic flush appears upon his cheek, his frame is emaciated, and he finally sinks into the grave. So with this country. It was strong for some years after the war; this policy planted the seeds not of resumption but of consumption in its vitals, and year by year that disease progressed, spreading from man to man, from community to community, until it has well-nigh destroyed us.

It was my purpose, Mr. President, not to rest the argument as to the responsibility of legislation upon these logical deductions and historical facts, cogent and convincing as they appear to my mind. I intended to have read largely from contemporaneous writers the direct proof that legislation in England was the sole cause of the trouble, but I shall not have the time. It was my purpose to show by Sir Archibald Alison, by Mr. Baptiste Say, that this suffering in England was not only caused by legislation, but that it overwhelmed every class except one. I intended to have read from Mr. Robert Mushet, from the Edinburgh Review, which I believe was the organ of the great Lord Brougham, from Sir James Graham, who although afterward a member of Peel's cabinet declared that Peel's law was responsible and solely responsible for the disasters which followed. I intended to have quoted from Lord Overton who complained of its injustice, and from Mr. J. R. McCulloch who said that its effect lasted for twenty years; but I do not consider that necessary. The proof seems to me complete.

Let me now sum up the testimony. We have seen the effects of this policy and of the opposite policy in various countries; we have seen the acknowledgment of Spaulding as to the distress produced in this country by the first act of legislative contraction; we have seen that Congress was forced to change its position on the subject; we have seen that such were the disasters produced by the very first effort at contraction as to compel every representative from every section of the country to vote its condemnation. We have seen the concurrent testimony of facts, of history, of experience, and of contemporaneous writers in England. Turn, sir, wherever you will, whatever the country, however governed, the testimony comes with accumulating and overpowering force to demonstrate the truth of the proposition that legislative interference is the cause of the woe and distress which afflict this country. Sir, have I established that proposition? If I have not, then evidence will establish nothing. If I have established it, if there be a shadow of truth in it, what argument can justify further contraction? The possibility of truth in this proposition is enough to turn us in dismay from such a policy.

Mr. President, it is related that in excavating among the ruins of Pompeii a bronze hand was found over the doorway of a palatial mansion pointing to the sign of Cave canem. That friendly admonition was intended doubtless to warn passers-by of the vicious animal within. Sir, amid all the financial ruins of the past the brazen hand of history is pointing to the warning against a more remorseless, insatiate, all-consuming foe. Shall we heed that warning? or shall we go on from contraction to contraction, from one degree of distress to another, down, until this whole people shall stand agonized with apprehension lest there be no gulf of ruin so deep that this legislative madness will not consign it to a still lower deep? Shall we go on in the face of these declarations of history, of contemporaneous writers, and in defiance of facts and experience? Shall we go on following the fatuous illusions dancing in the distance before us, heedless of the yawning chasm that intervenes and into which we are plunging this country with all its great interests? Shall we change this policy, around which hang the haggard forms of universal distress, and which can only be enforced amidst universal despair?

In discussing this proposition, it has been my purpose to be fair, accurate, and temperate and to speak to the calm judgment of the Senate. I have appealed to the prejudices of no class and to the animosities or special interests of no section. I believe that the day is at hand when there will be a general, if not a universal, concurrence in the truth of the proposition with which I set out. I believe the day is at hand when the property-owners of the great North and the merchants and the justly distinguished projectors of the great mills of New England will be driven to the conclusion that this policy of contraction has postponed the day of easy resumption, worked no good to the public and infinite ill to private interests. Certain it is that a policy which is destructive to the prosperity of those who produce the raw material is inimical also to those who manufacture it. Certain it is that if hurtful to one section it is hurtful to all. Certain it is that we shall never wisely solve any of these great problemsof governmental policy until we can consider them without passion and without prejudice to the interests of any class or any section. Never will they be wisely adjusted until a broad patriotism conspires with a general intelligence in their solution. That mind, however well educated, which cannot appreciate, and that heart, however honest, which cannot feel a glow of pride in contemplating the mighty development of the great West and North—pride in the enterprise, the grand industries, and splendid achievements which contribute to the high civilization of the great East; pride and trust in the honor, the courage, the patriotism, the fidelity, and the heroic endurance of the stricken South—such mind and heart are unsafe in council and unworthy the representatives of this community of States. [Applause in the galleries.]

Having said this, sir, let me now add that I am profoundly apprehensive that the Secretary of the Treasury will fail to maintain permanently specie payments, without great hazard first to the credit of the Government and second to the interests of the people. Unforseen circumstances may arise, unusual demands for coin may be made, and in such a crisis the Secretary will be forced either to procure the coin at ruinous rates or further to contract the currency and bring increased embarrassments or else to suspend without authority of law the payment of specie, and thus shock the public credit. I would therefore provide that under no circumstances should there be further contraction, and thus possibly protect the people against additional distress. I would provide by law that the Secretary of the Treasury should suspend specie payments whenever the coin reserves were diminished below the point designated in the law, and thus avoid unlawful suspension.

Mr. President, some such provisions as these seem to me not only wise and expedient, but absolutely demanded by our circumstances. Sir, you can no more, in debt as we are, with our industries in chains, enact permanent resumption than you can decree liberty on parchment while a people are enslaved.

Much has been said about public faith and the public credit. Sir, when mustered in defense of the demonetization of one of the people's legal tenders and in defense of the ruinous contraction of another of the people's legal-tenders, these high-sounding words "public faith," "public credit," "public honor," are meaningless; they are the deceptions, they are the concealments which cover from view the mortal stabs given to industry by this murderous legislation. So far as the South is concerned it is a great injustice and an untruth to charge upon her any infidelity to the public honor or the public credit. Her interests and her hopes are indissolubly identified with the interests and hopes of her sister-States and with the wise and benign management of this common Government. Sir, the Republic's flag is her flag, the Republic's honor is her honor; and when either is assailed she will not be found wanting in the contribution of her brain and blood to repel the assault. [Applause in the galleries.]

Without the danger of being misapprehended I may, in conclusion, refer to a great fact by way of encouraging the struggling masses of this unhappy country. There is no country on earth that offers such inducements to the poor man and the laborer. There is no citizen, however great his estate, or proud his position, or brilliant his intellect, who has a greater stake than the laboring-man in the peace of society and the stability of our institutions. Our history, every page of it, is replete with names like that of Stephen Girard, the poor French cabin-boy; John Jacob Astor, the German butcher-boy; Alexander T. Stewart, the Irish peasant boy; Nicholas Longworth, the shoemaker's apprentice; Amos Lawrence, the farmer boy of Massachusetts; Cornelius Vanderbilt, the Staten Island boatman; of Field, of Fulton, of Whitney, of Morse, of Marshall, and Henry, and of the majority of those who in our country have amassed fortune or acquired fame. It is the glory of our free institutions that they open to all the avennes to wealth and power, and the enforcement of law is protection to the weak and security to the fruits of labor. The spirit of violence is no less the harbinger of death to the poor man's hopes than to the rich man's gains, and agrarianism and that demoniac communism which appalls Europe, if tolerated here, will not only doom the rewards of labor, but hurry into inevitable extinction the rights and liberties of every class of our citizens. But, sir, no such ill-omened bird of night can find nutriment on this soil. The people are suffering, the country seems stirred by a profund agitation, but it is not, sir, the delirium of lawlessness. Beneath it and ruling over it is the law-abiding spirit of the American masses, strengthened, elevated, and sanctified by suffering, endurance, and trial. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the regular order, which is House bill No. 3974.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The Senator from California calls for the regular order.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 3d instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 706) authorizing the President of the United States to make certain negotiations with the Ute Indians in the State of Colorado; and on the 4th instant the following acts:

An act (S. No. 378) for the relief of William L. Hickam, of Missouri, guardian of the minor children of Hillary J. Jenkins; and

An act (S. No. 870) granting a pension to Rebecca and Augusta Miller, daughter of Brigadier-General James Miller, of the war of 1812.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 44) granting additional pension to John F. Chase, of Saybrook, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 79) granting a pension to Robert Butler;

A bill (H. R. No. 134) for the relief of Jacob G. Croman, of Dickinson, Cumberland County, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 147) granting a pension to Captain Robert C. Bramford;

A bill (H. R. No. 247) to grant a pension to George D. Phillips, a soldier of the war of 1812;

A bill (H. R No. 270) for the relief of the widow of Captain Christopher M. Haile, United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 471) granting a pension to Martha J. Robinson, widow of James H. Robinson;

A bill (H. R. No. 473) granting a pension to Rebecca C. Reich, widow of Gideon S. Reich, of Indianapolis, Indiana;

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADLEIGH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1197) granting a pension to Fielding Bradford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1198) to amend section 5414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and to punish forgery and other like crimes injuriously affecting foreign governments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MATTHEWS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1199) granting a pension to Henry Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3987) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings, insisted upon by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. O. R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, M. A. EICKHOFF of New York, and Mr. L. W. BALLOU of Rhode Island, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 285) granting a pension to Elizabeth D. Stone;
A bill (S. No. 328) granting a pension to Mrs. Esther A. George;
A bill (S. No. 697) granting a pension to Anna E. Robbins;
A bill (S. No. 703) granting a pension to Melvina A. Maltby;
A bill (S. No. 724) granting a pension to Nancy E. McClelland;
A bill (S. No. 755) granting a pension to Martha C. Kendall;
A bill (S. No. 869) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Wilkes, widow of the late Admiral Charles Wilkes, United States Navy; and A bill (S. No. 873) granting a pension to Hannah Streets.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3546) to change the name of the steamboat D. A. McDonald to Silver Wave;
A bill (H. R. No. 3828) to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties;"
A bill (H. R. No. 3978) to authorize the Barataria Ship-Canal Company to construct and operate a ship-canal from New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico through the lands and waters of the United States, and to grant to said company the right of way for that purpose;
A bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; and
A bill (H. R. No. 4674) to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters conterminous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1780) granting a pension to William S. Davis, late private in Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879.

The Chief Clerk read the bill down to line 15 where the first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations occurred.

Mr. SARGENT. Before any of the amendments are stated, I desire to make a very short statement as to the general features of this bill.

The total of the general estimate for pension purposes for 1879 was $28,010,000. Besides this, there were special estimates under the act of March 8, 1878, of $1,499,974 for the pensioners made by that act in the war of 1812 and their widows. Under the legislation of March 9, in the bill erroneously stated as March 8, any person who served in the war of 1812, although in merely a single engagement, is entitled to a pension if he survives, and his widow is entitled to a pension, whether married before that war or at any time since. By means of this legislation nearly a million and a half dollars are necessarily added to this pension bill. While I do not say that that legislation was at all improvident, it illustrates in the strongest way that a few lines in a pension bill may put millions upon the Treasury to be paid annually thereafter. There are 22,225 new names upon the pension-roll since the last annual pension appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. WITHERS. Do they come under this act of March 9?

Mr. SARGENT. Under this act of March 9.

Mr. WITHERS. Not all of them.

Mr. SARGENT. That I understand is the addition made on account of that legislation. There is a reduction on account of the expiration of pensions paid to children in the last war and widows' deaths and marriages; but I understand this legislation has placed upon the roll the number which I have stated.

Mr. KERNAN. Does not that include all who have been placed upon the roll since the last appropriation bill, whatever the war?

Mr. SARGENT. That is just the difference of recollection between myself and my friend from Virginia. He thinks that is the case.

Mr. WITHERS. That is my impression. I was going to say that in my view of the information derived from the Pension Bureau at the time that bill was pending such an increase was impossible. Though from my necessary absence I speak without knowledge upon that subject, I think it is impossible that increase can have been procured by the passage of that act alone, but it is the result of all the additions to the roll by the special acts of legislation, of which we have many hundred every year.

Mr. SARGENT. The Commissioner of Pensions informed the subcommittee that the estimate which he made of the number of names it would be necessary to put on the roll in consequence of that act was realized. If the Senator can remember the amount of that estimate it will be a test whether his recollection is correct or not.

Mr. WITHERS. Not more than three or four thousand.

Mr. SARGENT. Much more than that.

Mr. WITHERS. I have the report here.

Mr. KERNAN. I will suggest that applications are constantly coming in, men making applications representing that they were wounded in the last war.

Mr. SARGENT. It is possible that my memory is infirm in this matter, but the whole increase is 22,225 after the deduction of those whose terms have expired for the reasons which I have given. The amount of the increase on account of that law is $1,499,974, which would be a very large sum, the Senator from Virginia will observe, to be divided between three or four thousand persons at the rate of pension allowed by that law.

Mr. WITHERS. I am satisfied, and the Senator himself will concur with me in this view I am sure, that the additions to the pension-roll have not been made exclusively by the legislation of the 9th of March last——

Mr. SARGENT. Not exclusively.

Mr. WITHERS. For the reason that there are hundreds and many hundreds of cases being added weekly. We have heard repeatedly from the bureau that they were eighteen months behind in their investigations of the cases of persons who make applications for pensions on account of service in the late war, and as these are allowed they are added to the roll. In addition to that we have to add to the roll the names of those who are granted pensions by specific acts of Congress, amounting to several hundred a year.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very well aware of that. My impression, however, is, from the manner the estimates were made, that that act has caused twenty-two thousand names to be added. The difference between us is one of recollection on a matter of no practical importance, the main point being that we are called upon for a million and a half dollars more on account of the passage of that legislation.

The total of the bill is $29,371,574, as it came from the House of Representatives, the bill being less than the estimates $138,400. The total of the act for 1878 was $28,533,000, and this bill as it came from the House exceeded the bill of last year by $878,537. The Senate committee have added but one item, that is, $35,000, which is for fees for examinations; and that brings me to the amendment the Clerk was about to report. I ask that he report the amendment now, and I will explain the reasons why the committee have added this amount.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations is in line 15 of section 1, to strike out "fifty" and insert "eighty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

And for fees of examining surgeon $85,000, as provided by the several acts of Congress;

And to strike out the proviso commencing in line 16 to the end of the clause, as follows:

Provided, That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to examining-surgeon for each examination of pensioner, as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid.

Mr. SARGENT. If the proviso is stricken out, the amount which the committee add, being the amount called for in the estimates, is necessary.

Mr. KERNAN. Suppose the proviso is not stricken out, will the original sum of $50,000 be sufficient?

Mr. SARGENT. Then the sum of $50,000 would be sufficient, but I want to give a reason why we struck it out.

Mr. KERNAN. I will listen.

Mr. SARGENT. The fee now provided by law for an examining surgeon is $2; and one difficulty is that that hardly pays for that class of service. This examination is the entering wedge to the Treasury; it is the test to which the person applying for a pension is subjected, when it is determined whether or not he shall go upon the pension roll. This bill appropriates in round numbers, and has for years about $30,000,000; and this examination is a test between those who are entitled and those who are not entitled to go on that pension roll. I have no doubt whatever, from the information I have received, that there ought to be even a better system of examination than is now provided for. Where a surgeon can have a large number of cases to examine, forty or fifty a month, $2 a case perhaps pays sufficiently; but it is necessary for the convenience of pensioners who have trouble to find a surgeon that these surgeons should be distributed all through the country. There are in all sixteen hundred of them, including those who serve upon the biennial boards of examination, and they cannot be located in the large cities and the men sent from all over a State or district to meet them there, because it is too heavy a charge on the poor people who ordinarily apply for pensions. Therefore we have to have them in the smaller towns, and their great number makes such a division that the amount of fees for examinations falling to each one in a large majority of cases is very small.

Now, the amount of $2 is hardly enough to induce men to familiarize themselves with the rules of the Department, with the provisions of law, with that which is necessary to be understood by them in order to do their duty intelligently. You cut them down to $1, one half that amount, and you simply aggravate the evil. The Commissioner of Pensions was under the impression, and I think the committee concurred with him, that it would be well for Congress to take this thing in hand and legislate for the establishment of some kind of a board of commissioners or a certain number of commissioners to travel through various parts of the country, to be paid an annual salary for that service and their expenses, and that, they bringing to the examination a greater degree of skill and severe integrity, the result would be that many who now receive pensions on false pretenses would not be allowed to receive pensions. But this is an evil, aggravated by not paying those who are now employed sufficient compensation to secure adequate service.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to inquire how frequently the men who are on the pension-roll are examined. Only when they are ordered to be examined?

Mr. SARGENT. Only when they are ordered to be examined. No one is examined except upon an order of the Commissioner of Pensions. Sometimes a man is examined twice, when his first examination is not satisfactory, sometimes a third time, but then by different physicians, in order that the Department may be as sure as it can be whether he is qualified or not. Then there is what is called a biennial examination, which is made by a board before whom the pensioners go and are examined to ascertain whether they should be continued upon the roll. That would look in theory to be a good system, but it does not work effectively. In one case, where as a matter of experiment a physician of good attainments was sent out and his expenses paid for the purpose of visiting pensioners in a certain district, the result of his examinations made in that way, by calling upon the different pensioners and examining them, was that several thousand dollars were saved to the Treasury over and above the expenses paid to him. Perhaps something of that kind ought to be introduced; but the question now is whether we ought to reduce the amount of this fee one-half when the fee itself is hardly sufficient to secure adequate service. The committee therefore recommend that the House proviso be stricken out and that the amount of the estimate be given.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have not heard all the discussion unfortunately, having been called out once or twice; but I am satisfied from what the Senator from California says that the Senate Committee on Appropriations was right in striking out the proviso—

That a fee of $1 and no more shall be paid to examining surgeon for each examination of pensioner, as provided by law, and increasing the amount appropriated from $50,000 to $85,000, so as to enable the Commissioner to call upon physicians of acknowledged ability and of character and position in their profession to give the information necessary to act, in order to ascertain whether the pensioner should remain on the rolls or whether the pension should be increased or diminished, or what change should be had.

Mr. KERNAN. I understand as the law now is that each physician who examines a man alone gets $2.

Mr. BECK. Two dollars.

Mr. KERNAN. And it is proposed to strike out the proviso in the bill as it came from the House, providing a fee of $1, which would leave the law as it is, and $2 will continue to be the fee of the men regularly appointed to examine pensioners.

Mr. BECK. That is it, and it is because we believed that men of standing in their profession having studied those particular things and familiarized themselves with them, who are required to make sometimes very minute examinations to protect the United States, ought not to be required to take less than the ordinary consultation fee in their office, although plenty of men would be willing to serve and take a fee of $1. We believed that it would secure a better class of physicians, and that it was necessary to retain the present fee in order to prevent the employment of the very class that we would not want to have.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, one word. The committee examined this question very thoroughly. I, as a member of the subcommittee, entered upon it with a prejudice against the proposed change; that is, I favored the House bill as it came to the Senate with an appropriation of $50,000, believing that $35,000 could be saved to the Government by its adoption; but after hearing the Commissioner of Pensions, and after giving the subject that thought which such a matter ought to have, I came to the conclusion that it would be economy to adopt the amendment now proposed by the committee, or in other words to leave the law in its present state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 30, section 1, after the word "March," to strike out "eighth" and insert "ninth;" so as to read:

For pensions payable under the act of March 9th, 1878, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 56, section 1, after the word "fees" to strike out "and;" and in the same line, after the word "allowances" to insert "and expenses aforesaid;" so as to read:

And the sum of $216,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to pay the salaries, fees, allowances, and expenses aforesaid, to said pension agents.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I take it there is no objection to that. It is to correct an inadvertency.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

That from and after July 1, 1878, the office of pension agents shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That hereafter, in the appointment of pension agents, the preference shall be given to wounded or disabled soldiers.

Mr. SARGENT. There is a verbal correction necessary. After the word "disabled" before the word "soldiers," in the fifth line of the section, the word "Union" was omitted. I want to insert that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no objection to perfecting the amendment in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That was the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir. Mr. President, the proposition as it came from the House of Representatives empties every pension agency in the country, there being eighteen of them, on the first day of the next fiscal year, and provides the qualifications of persons who shall be appointed to fill those offices. In the judgment of myself at any rate—and I think I speak for the committee—that provision is unconstitutional. The power of appointment to office resides with the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The power to abolish an office unquestionably resides in Congress. Congress could, if it saw fit, provide that after the 1st day of July the office of pension agent should not exist; but I do not believe that it has the constitutional power to provide that all the officers of this or any other class shall be emptied on that day and refilled with another class of persons, naming the qualifications of those other persons.

But there is another objection to the provision inserted in the bill by the House. The least bond given by these agents I believe is a quarter of a million of dollars, and it is by no means certain that wounded and disabled soldiers who can give this bond can be found at short notice in all the pension districts of the United States. Furthermore, the adoption of the House provision would make a disturbance and a disarrangement necessarily at all the pension agencies in the country. It would necessarily make an interregnum in the payments which now proceed promptly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question on that point?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. The pensions become payable on the 4th of June succeeding this date, do they not?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the pension agents not be able to make payment of the quarterly pensions due on the 4th of June, prior to the 1st of July? At any of the pension agencies do the pensions remain unpaid for a month after the time fixed for their payment?

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt that the bulk of them would be paid before the commencement of the fiscal year on the 1st of July, but still there would be many not paid for the reason partly that they are not called for, and by reason of the magnitude of the business at some of the offices, and for other reasons. The great bulk of them are paid unquestionably in the first ten days after the time fixed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask if it is not the rule and the requirement that on the 4th of June blank receipts shall be sent in duplicate to all the pensioners at their post-office address, unless they are pensioners who are paid at the Pension Office; that they sign those duplicate receipts, with the proper affidavit, and return them to the pension agent, and then he sends out a check on the subtreasury nearest the place where the pensioner lives, and that it is all a mere matter of writing, and is generally done within a very few days after the 4th of June, and in many instances they send them out before the 4th of June?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It takes some time for the matter to get through the mails. If there were nothing else in the way, the lack of mail facilities alone would preclude the payment of all the pensions in so short a time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should think the case where it would take two weeks for pensioners to get notice from the Pension Office would be exceedingly rare in any part of the United States. You would have to go probably into the Territories for an instance of that kind.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. On many of the mail-routes we have but weekly mails, and if the mail should happen to miss one week the papers would go over until the second week, and then a week would be a short time for the matter to reach the pensioner, who sometimes lives several miles from the post-office.

Mr. COCKRELL. These pensioners all know precisely the day when their pensions become due. They are expecting the papers, and they are nearly always on hand at that time. It seems to me it would be a gross neglect of duty on the part of any pension agent not to have a pension paid before the 1st of July.

Mr. SARGENT. My opinion is that they are not all paid and that there is quite a large number that are not paid within that time. It seems to me there is no fault to find with the efficiency of the pension agencies. They have been very largely reduced in number, as the Senator is aware.

Mr. COCKRELL. From fifty to twenty-five.

Mr. SARGENT. To eighteen. They have been brought down enormously, making the business in some of the districts very large indeed, and making the clerical work of payment in the drawing of checks, &c., enormous.

Furthermore, this office is by no means a sinecure. It requires well and strong men, men of fine business capacity. There is a very large responsibility connected with the office. Here are $30,000,000 to be handled, one-fourth of it every three months. Sick men cannot fill such places. There is no reason why wounded and disabled soldiers, if they are otherwise qualified, should not have these places. The fact is that of eighteen there are three who eminently come under the qualification of sick and wounded soldiers, and most of them were soldiers. One of the very best agents is the daughter of a soldier. I am indisposed to turn her out two months from now without notice, and I am indisposed to turn out soldiers who are discharging this duty well and have given bonds and are in the honest and proper discharge of the duty.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I shall vote at the proper time to reject the amendment of the Senate committee, and also to disagree with section 2 of the bill as sent to us from the House of Representatives. I make that motion if it be in order. It will be observed that section 2 of the bill as sent from the House provides:

That from and after July 1, 1878, the office of pension agents shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

I deny the power of Congress to impose such a limitation on the right of the President in making such appointments. The Constitution of the United States provides in section 2 of article 2 that the President shall have power to appoint all public "officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

The pension agents are officers whose appointments have not been provided for by Congress, nor vested in the courts of law or the heads of Departments, and therefore remain presidential appointees. The Constitution gives the President of the United States the absolute right to select from all the people the officers whom he may appoint. Section 2 of the bill as sent to us by the House of Representatives is an attempt on the part of the legislative department of this Government to impose a limitation on the right of the Executive to make such appointments as by the Constitution are conferred upon him, and upon him alone. If the President is to be confined in appointing these officers to wounded or disabled Union soldiers, he may find in many sections of the country that he is unable to obtain men who are honest, faithful, competent, and able to give the bond required.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that by the section as amended by the Senate committee the President is not confined to any particular class, but preference is to be given to wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

Mr. BECK. I am now speaking to section 2 as it came from the House; I will come to the committee's amendment presently, and hope to be able to show the Senator from West Virginia that it is, in a less offensive form but by indirection, an attempt to do the thing which the House boldly did.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator may be right about that.

Mr. BECK. If I am, then the objection pertains as well to the one as to the other. I know how sensitive both Houses are whenever you come to speak of wounded Union soldiers, but we have a great duty to perform, and that is not to allow the Executive to infringe upon our power and to take care that we do not seek to infringe his rights, duties, and obligations. He is required to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has a constitutional right to select from the people, no matter whether they were Union soldiers or civilians, the officers who in his judgment can give the required bond and will faithfully perform the duties imposed upon them by the appointment which he may make. Any attempt on the part of Congress to limit him to a class of men and to exclude all other classes of men by legislation, when he is vested by the Constitution with the power to select from all classes of men, is a legislative invasion of the executive prerogative.

I know there are sections of the country where men think they can be elected to the lower House and perhaps come to the Senate if they pander to this feeling. Such feelings and such sentiments are unworthy of any man fit to be a representative here. I do not say that the House or the Senate in this particular thing is pandering to that sentiment; but it may be that such a consideration has influenced some persons, and it is well for us in the Senate to say that while we will zealously guard all invasions of our rights by the Executive, we will with equal jealousy protect all his rights against any invasion by us, no matter what may be the motive that prompted us to attempt it.

The man who cannot come to the House or the Senate without telling the wounded soldier that he tried to put him into a place of power and, in violation of the Constitution, by limiting the authority of the Executive, perhaps would be better at home. I want to speak plainly, because I believe that is the best way always to arrive at the truth. The Senate committee differed from the House and undertook to amend the provision by saying that hereafter in the appointment of pension agents the preference shall be given to wounded and disabled Union soldiers. I insist that that is only an indirect way of doing the same unconstitutional act which I think the House did.

It is time, if we expect to be one people, to live in harmony as I hope we shall hereafter, that there should be nothing put upon the statute-books now that would strike down the rights of any citizen to hold any office that the President in the exercise of his discretion might think he was better fitted to fill than any other citizen. The President should not be required to go back twelve years to inquire whether the person occupied a particular relation at that time in order to give him a preference over anybody else to fill a place. I voted for pensions and land warrants and bounties for soldiers, their widows, and their children. I believe in the Government of the United States protecting the men who aided in protecting it, but I will not go so far as to say that the proper form of paying them for anything they may have done is to limit the constitutional power of the President to select the best men that he may find or to limit him to a particular class or to have imputations cast upon him because he thought some man who was not a soldier was a better man to give a bond and to protect the pensioners of the Government than somebody who happened to be wounded or disabled and who was clamoring for the place.

I insist that both the amendment of the Senate committee and the original section as inserted by the House are vicious legislation, not calculated to promote the good of the people nor a good precedent for the government of the Executive hereafter. In saying all this I do not intend to have it understood that I seek to deprive any wounded or disabled soldier of any rights that he may have or any pensioners or anybody of anything that this Government may see fit to give them when you do not interfere with the right of the Executive.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I should be willing to vote for this clause of the bill now under discussion as it came from the House but for the fact that I believe as the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from California both do that it is a violation of the Constitution. I believe the power of the Executive cannot be thus restricted as to matters of appointment; that he has a right to make his selections anywhere, and if they are confirmed by the Senate they are appointed. Now, the substitute for that which has been presented by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, which simply gives a preference, is just as objectionable as the other in principle. All it can possibly amount to will be simply a recommendation; it has not the force of law, and we have not the power to give it the force of law. That, at least, is my opinion, and I shall so vote.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President, I dissented from the amendment made by the Committee on Appropriations to the bill as it came from the House for two or three reasons, one of which was that the amendment which the Committee on Appropriations adopted is the law now, and has been for ten years past, and it seemed to me to be, to say the least of it, a subterfuge to present anything of that sort instead of what the House passed. Section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, being an act approved March 3, 1865, thirteen years ago, declares that—

> Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity, &c.

Mr. BECK. Suppose the Senator reads the whole of it.

Mr. DORSEY. But the Senator from Kentucky says he objects to this section because it is unconstitutional and because the President cannot be controlled in respect to appointments by Congress. If that Senator, while he was in another place and a very attentive member, as he is here, had called the attention of Congress to this provision of the Revised Statutes, which has been in existence thirteen years, and had had it repealed as unconstitutional, his services would have been as important in that respect as in calling the attention of the Senate to the provision in the House bill now.

Without going into the question whether there be a sufficient number of wounded soldiers in this country to hold the office of pension agent, I desire to say that out of the six or seven hundred thousand Federal soldiers who were discharged after the war was over I venture to assert that in the State of my friend from California, in that of the Senator from Kentucky, and in all the States where we have pension agents, the Government can find men who have both the capacity to discharge the duties of this office and the ability to furnish the bond that is required for it. I think it is a very miserable excuse to say that men who hold this office must furnish a large bond, implying thereby that the wounded soldiers of this country are not able to furnish a bond.

Now, I offer the following amendment in lieu of the one reported by the Committee on Appropriations:

> That from and after the 1st day of October, 1878, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter the office of pension agent shall be filled by honorably discharged Union soldiers.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from California who reported this bill a question, though I feel very confident of the answer before I ask it. It is whether it is his desire in reporting this section to make ineligible to the office of pension agent the widow or daughter of a deceased soldier?

Mr. SARGENT. I should be very sorry to have it have that effect.

Mr. HOAR I was quite sure of that.

Mr. SARGENT. The House section would do it.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that. The fact is, as to one very important pension agency in this country, that the office is now filled by the daughter of a very distinguished soldier. I move as an amendment to the committee's report—and I propose to move the same as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas—the following at the end——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will not now be in order.

Mr. SARGENT. It is in order to amend the amendment of the committee, because there is something which it is proposed to substitute for that, and of course it can be amended before the substitution is made.

Mr. HOAR. This is, to perfect it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the amendment of the committee:

> Or to the widows or daughters of such soldiers.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it is in order to perfect the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in order.

Mr. HOAR. I also move the same clause as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, which I have no doubt he will accept.

Mr. DORSEY. I wish to amend the amendment that I offered so as to embrace the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas modifies his amendment. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the amendment, as the Senator from Arkansas has modified it, read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of Mr. DORSEY, as modified, now proposes to strike out all after the word "that," of the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee in lieu of the second section, and to insert:

> From and after the 1st day of October, 1878, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire; and thereafter the office of pension agent shall be filled by honorably discharged Union soldiers or the widows or daughters of such soldiers.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say, and in this he is seconded I believe by the Senator from Michigan, that it is unconstitutional for the Senate to direct the President to appoint wounded, disabled, and honorably discharged soldiers to office.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. What I do say is that it is unconstitutional to require him to do that, and not give him the liberty of selection.

Mr. INGALLS. If it is unconstitutional to appoint them——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me? I only intended to say that it was unconstitutional to prohibit him from appointing anybody else.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand that this amendment does that.

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. INGALLS. Or that the section proposed by the House does that.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to say one word?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not wish to be misrepresented; as saying that I think it is unconstitutional for the President to appoint wounded soldiers. I have said nothing of that kind.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment that is offered by the Committee on Appropriations to the section that is proposed by the House declares that the President shall appoint wounded and disabled and honorably discharged Union soldiers as pension agents. The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Michigan both say that is unconstitutional. There can therefore be no escape from the deduction that they think it is unconstitutional for the Senate to direct the President to appoint soldiers to office.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Kansas has come to that conclusion, he has been trained in a school different from any other Senator on this floor. I mean to say distinctly now that, while the President has an equal right to appoint them—and I would not deprive them of any right they now have—and he has appointed a number of them, and I suppose he will continue to appoint them, we have no right to say he shall not appoint anybody else.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I understand the Senator to withdraw from his position.

Mr. BECK. Not a bit of it.

Mr. INGALLS. And that he does not consider it unconstitutional for the Senate to direct the President to appoint Union soldiers to office.

Mr. BECK. I never made any such assertion.

Mr. INGALLS. I certainly am at a loss to understand the position taken by the Senator from Kentucky. Here is a section in the bill as sent from the House, expressing the sense of that body, and, through the amendment proposed by the committee, indirectly the sense of this body, that Union soldiers who have been wounded or disabled and honorably discharged should be appointed pension agents. Senators gravely arise and say that that is unconstitutional, that we have no right to direct the President to appoint Union soldiers to office. If there is any escape from that conclusion, I should be glad to know what it is. And I have further to say that if this is unconstitutional it certainly is for the President himself to decide, and if the House and Senate as their sense in this matter should declare that this should be his action, if he decided it to be unconstitutional, then he and his law officers can take the responsibility. I should regret very much indeed to have the Senate commit itself to the position, whatever might be the opinion of the President or his law officers, that it was unconstitutional to direct honorably discharged wounded and disabled Union soldiers to be appointed to the office of pension agent or to any other office. The Senator from Kentucky said that it was now about twelve years since the war was closed——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to say one word?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The point is not that we shall direct that Union soldiers be appointed, but we require that they shall be appointed, and that none others shall be appointed.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin object to having Union soldiers appointed pension agents?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is not the question.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the question, Mr. President.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is not the question at all. The question is, what does the bill as it comes from the House provide? That is the question.

That from and after July 1, 1878, the office of pension agent shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the objection to that?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am not talking about that now.

Mr. INGALLS. That is what I am speaking about. If the Senator has any objection to it, if he wants to commit himself against that proposition, I should like him to state on what ground.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We have not reached that.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it on the ground that they are disqualified or incompetent, or, as some Senator has said, that they are unable to give bond? Is it possible that it is to be maintained on this floor that of the six hundred thousand or seven hundred thousand disabled or honorably discharged Union soldiers there cannot be enough found to fill eighteen pension agencies and give a sufficient bond?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That proposition has not been discussed yet. I think there are. I think that a sufficient number can be found. The pension district in which the State of Wisconsin is included will not be affected by this bill, because the pension agent who is located at Milwaukee is a wounded soldier and he was honorably discharged, and he is a very competent agent. But the point is that the bill as it came from the House provides that Union soldiers, disabled and so on, and none others, shall be appointed.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the objection to that?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The objection that is made to it is that it is unconstitutional to require the President to select these and none others.

Mr. INGALLS. Is not that a question for the President to decide, and not for us?

Mr. SARGENT. Do we not swear to support the Constitution?

Mr. INGALLS. Undoubtedly we do; and as I understand the Constitution it is plainly within our province to do that. If the President when this law has passed——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Do we not require the President to appoint lawyers to positions on the bench?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly. No one will deny, as the Senator from Iowa states, that it would be absurd to expect the President to appoint anybody but lawyers to positions on the bench. But there is an evident fitness, an evident propriety that can escape no one's attention, in requiring the President to appoint to the discharge of these particularly sacred duties those men who have been wounded and disabled in the service of the country.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. With great pleasure.

Mr. EATON. Would my friend suggest that the President of the United States should appoint none others to office abroad, to fill the appointments abroad, as ministers, &c., except disabled soldiers? He can appoint disabled soldiers if he likes for every one of the appointments abroad and others; and so here if this is stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. I should not object to voting for a provision directing the President to fill all the offices of honor and trust in this country with disabled Union soldiers.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But in this we do not simply direct him, but require him.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it is right.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Does the Senator from Kansas say that he will vote for a law which requires the President to appoint only Union disabled soldiers to fill these foreign appointments?

Mr. INGALLS. I would with great pleasure; I think it would be eminently appropriate to do it. There are plenty of them to do it; and if there is a class of men in this country that have earned the right of recognition and have earned the right to civil promotion, it is these men who have suffered the loss of limb and of health in the service of their country.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does the Senator from Kansas think it is a wise declaration to make that all classes except a particular class shall be excluded from a particular class of offices?

Mr. INGALLS. The Union soldiers of this country do not belong to any particular class; they embrace all sorts and conditions of men, from the highest to the lowest, lawyers and doctors and clergymen and merchants and artisans and all other conditions of men; and there will be no difficulty, whatever may be necessary and whenever it may be necessary to find a man in any particular class, to get a man who was a soldier in the Union Army.

Mr. PADDOCK. But there are a great many lawyers and doctors and others who were not soldiers. Is it wise and proper legislation to say that they should be excluded from any class of offices? Referring to a matter that has been somewhat a subject of controversy here in reference to the Indian agencies, how would it do to apply it to the gentlemen who have been appointed as agents to the Indian agencies under the present rule?

Mr. INGALLS. I am in favor of turning the Indian service over to the War Department. So that will dispose of that question.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have not asked the Senator for an opinion on that subject; but would he say it would be a wise provision of law that the President should be required to appoint to these agencies only clergymen of the Presbyterian church, for instance, excluding all the others? I only speak of that to illustrate. Would it be constitutional and proper?

Mr. INGALLS. That would depend very largely on the question of qualification. There can be no question about the qualification of Union soldiers to fill these positions, and there can be no question about the peculiar qualification and the peculiar fitness and the peculiar propriety of the duties of these particular offices being exercised by disabled Union soldiers. If the section that is proposed by the House is unconstitutional, if it is in violation of law or in violation of propriety, the amendment that is proposed by the committee is none the less so, and it has the additional disadvantage in my mind of a little attempt to evade by indirection what the committee did not care to object to openly and above-board. If it is unconstitutional to pass the second section of this bill as it came from the House, it is equally unconstitutional and, to a certain extent, a great deal more improper, to pass the amendment proposed by the committee. It attempts to do by indirection what the other does openly and directly.

But, sir, I wish to say one word further in this connection; and that is, that in my judgment all pensions should be paid at Washington. There is no good reason, that I have ever been able to understand, why the payment of pensions to two hundred and thirty thousand or two hundred and forty thousand pensioners should be distributed over different sections of the country, or why as in other cases these payments should not be made direct from this city where the office is located. The Committee on Pensions have under consideration at this time a measure looking to that end; and while this bill was not submitted to that committee, and of course we have no amendments to offer and no right to submit any, I should be very glad if that subject could have been considered here, although I suppose under the rules it would be impossible.

The present system of paying pensions costs somewhere between $300,000 and $350,000; and it is estimated by experts who have calculated upon the subject and estimated the number of additional clerks that would be required here in the Department, that not less than $200,000 annually could be saved by the payment of pensions direct from Washington with no additional annoyance or delay to the pensioners. There might be in inaugurating this system a slight temporary difficulty that would perhaps result in deferring the payment of one-tenth of the entire list of pensioners ten days or two weeks; but after the first payment, when the system was fully adjusted, the pensioners would receive their money just as speedily as they do now, and the Treasury would be saved an amount of not less than $200,000 per annum.

Mr. SARGENT. Estimating on the basis of this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Estimating on the basis of this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. How much is the appropriation for this purpose? Instead of being $350,000 the amount is only $216,000.

Mr. INGALLS. I am talking about all the expenses?

Mr. SARGENT. This covers all the expenses.

Mr. INGALLS. All the expenses that are paid by the pensioners themselves are included in the amount I have stated. There are large sums paid by the pensioners themselves that do not appear here. I am talking about the entire expenses of administering the Pension Bureau.

Mr. SARGENT. The entire expenses of administering the Pension Bureau would be simply very largely increased by the proposition so fully discussed in the House and to which the Senator alludes, that is to say by having all the work done here instead of done at eighteen agencies.

Mr. INGALLS. The discussion in the House on this subject was very partial and based on insufficient and inaccurate statistics, and those statistics were furnished to the committee by officers who were hostile to the plan and who threw every possible obstacle that could be conceived in the way of carrying it out. I am prepared to show to the Senate when this bill can be reported that there is an annual saving to the Government by the plan that is proposed of not less than $200,000 per year. But that is wide apart from the proposition that is now before the Senate.

I shall favor the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Arkansas. I believe it to be just and wise and in accordance with the Constitution and the law that these sums should be disbursed and that these offices should be exercised and these duties discharged by men who have shared in that great contest which rendered this enormous pension list a part of the annual burdens of our country. I hope, therefore, that if the section as reported from the House is not to be adopted, the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be taken in its stead.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that this question before the Senate is one of a good deal more difficulty than is supposed by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Michigan on the one side and the Senator from Kansas on the other. I suppose it is clear that no Senator, unless it be the Senator from Kansas, will gainsay that we cannot constitutionally provide by law that the President shall appoint to an office from a certain class of citizens only. In the first place that would be an invasion of the appointing power which is lodged in the executive department of the Government; and in the next place it would be giving to one class of citizens privileges which are denied to all other classes of citizens. If we could constitutionally provide that a particular class of citizens only shall be eligible to one office, we could with equal right provide constitutionally that that class of citizens should be eligible only to any office.

Mr. INGALLS. Would it be unconstitutional to declare that the President should appoint to judicial positions only men learned in the law?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. I made that suggestion to the Senator who asked him that question a little while ago, and I am coming to it presently, as my conclusion is the same as that which the Senator from Kansas comes to. I suppose nobody would deny that it was unconstitutional to provide that the President should not appoint anybody who was worth more than a thousand dollars to any office in this country; that he should not appoint anybody that did not reside in Ohio, or Kansas; but on the other hand it is equally true that it is constitutional to provide in regard to the qualification for office, and, as aiming at the qualification to perform the duty, that the officer shall be taken from persons having a particular experience. Nobody would doubt that it was constitutional to establish a new court and provide that the President should appoint three persons learned in the law as judges. Nobody would doubt that it would be constitutional to provide for a life-saving service and provide that experienced pilots should be the commanders or should have certain functions with regard to that. This very bill recognizes what has been provided heretofore—the office of examining surgeon. Nobody would question that as to this examination, which is a public office and a public function, we may provide by law that the examination of a pensioner shall be only by surgeons.

Now, the question is, on which side of that line does this provision come fairly? I suppose we might provide also with entire constitutionality that the office of paying Army pensions should be filled from the Army alone, that present Army officers or soldiers now in the Army alone should have the duty of making up the lists of disbursements of funds to soldiers who were borne upon the list. It would be attaching new duties to an existing office, and nobody would question that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? I understand the Senator to say that it is competent for Congress to limit——

Mr. HOAR. I have not made my point yet. Perhaps the Senator will wait until I make it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let the Senator hear the argument. I understand the Senator to take the position that it is competent for Congress to limit the discretion of the executive department of the Government in the appointing power to a particular class of persons for a particular office. Now, I ask if that is true?

Mr. HOAR. To a certain extent which I was stating.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If that is true, is it not equally competent for Congress to designate one particular individual out of the particular class that shall be appointed to the office? Does it not follow as a natural consequence that, if we can control the discretion to any extent, we may control that discretion to the extent of designating the particular man to fill the office?

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly to——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I understand the Senator's position——

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator is putting me a question. The Senator is breaking in upon my statement of a point, which is a difficult one, by substituting a statement which he likes better, in the form of a question on the other side. He is not putting a question at all in any practical sense.

I had stated before the Senator rose that I supposed we should all agree, unless we were to understand the Senator from Kansas as doubting it, that what the Senator from Delaware assumes in his question is unconstitutional, that you cannot provide that a particular function shall be performed solely by a particular class of citizens. On the other hand I suppose that the Senator from Delaware will agree that you can provide that a duty requiring special qualifications shall be provided for by the appointment from persons whose previous training or relation to that duty gives them those qualifications. The Senator from Delaware would not question the constitutionality of a provision establishing a court of claims and requiring that it should be filled by counselors learned in the law, I suppose. He might as well argue from that you can appoint the lawyer——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that I should question that particular position, because I have not given that particular phase of this question the consideration which the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Kansas seem to have given it. I take it upon the broader ground, upon the ground that we cannot interfere with the power of the President.

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield to the Senator from Delaware to address the Senate at the present time. I prefer to do it myself, with his permission.

Taking these two principles on the one side and on the other, it seems to me that we might constitutionally provide that the payment of Army pensions, which is a duty connecting itself with the Army rolls, and the payments being solely to persons who have served or are at present borne on the rolls of the Army, may be imposed upon soldiers or officers in the Army. It will be very clear that it could be imposed on those at present in the service. I presume the Senator from Michigan would not question that we could annex to a present existing duty.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That is not appointing to office, but simply imposing a new duty on an existing office.

Mr. HOAR. That is very true, though the President might designate out of the thousands of such officers or soldiers particular individuals for that purpose. Now it seems to me that it comes fairly within that reasoning to hold that these persons, still retaining a certain relation to the Army of the United States, having been Army officers or soldiers, familiar as such with the service and with the lists and bearing still this special relation to the public of being its pensioners, the relation of the soldier not having completely terminated in that respect; that is, the pensioner not yet having received what he is entitled to receive from the Government under the law for his services, it seems to me that it is not unconstitutional to provide that from the class of pensioners the duty shall be performed by members of the particular class to which it relates. Of course it would not be constitutional to provide that this class of persons should receive a pension and no other. Were it not for the military relation which they sustain to the Government, I suppose the picking out arbitrarily a large number of citizens to receive a pension cannot be supported either on grounds of public policy or on constitutional grounds. But it seems to me that the law recognizing the right and the duty of the Government to pay to soldiers pensions, we may constitutionally impose the duties in reference to that payment upon existing officers or soldiers or those who have been heretofore officers or soldiers but having left the office still remain pensioners on the Government.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas, if he had understood me at the commencement of my remarks, would certainly not, I think, have made some remarks which he did make. He seemed to take it for granted that I was opposed to appointing wounded and disabled soldiers as pension agents. I commenced my statement by saying that if it were constitutional to do so, if no question of power existed in the case, I would favor this provision of this bill as it came from the House, but that I did not think it competent to deprive the Executive of the right to select officers of this kind from any class of people in the community; and I repeat that.

To me the proposition is perfectly plain; and yet on the other hand there is another class of cases which I did not allude to, because I did not wish to make the debate broader than it need to be to meet the case before the Senate. Take the case of the judge put by the Senator from Massachusetts. I think it is perfectly competent to provide in the establishment of a court that the President shall appoint certain persons learned in the law as judges of that court. Why? Because that is the plain meaning of the Constitution itself. The language of the Constitution has reference to the common understanding of the people and to the whole history of our country and the country from which we derived our institutions; and when we speak of a court we always understand that the judges are men learned in the law, and required to be so to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution itself.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to inquire of him whether it would be unconstitutional for the President to appoint a person as judge who was not learned in the law, to appoint a layman?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will answer that question by saying that any President doing so knowingly ought to be impeached, and, in my opinion, would be.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I disagree entirely with my friend who has just taken his seat. One of the best judges who ever sat in the court of common pleas, a court of original jurisdiction, in the county in which I practiced law for a great many years, was a man who never had been admitted to the bar as a lawyer at all, but who had acquired his knowledge of the profession by his experience of it when he was on the bench.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to say that he might have been very learned in the law and never admitted to the bar?

Mr. MATTHEWS. But he never had studied law and he was not learned in the law when he was appointed. He was a man of extraordinary good sense and he knew the law by intuition and not by learning, and therefore he was not "learned in the law." Now it does seem to me that it is rather straining a point to say that Congress, the law-making power, may not prescribe the qualifications of an officer and may not prescribe those qualifications in such a way as to describe a class and so confine the appointment to that class. I do not think, however ill-advised the proposition may be in other respects if it be so, that it is open to the objection which has been made.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I am somewhat anxious to get a vote on the bill to-night and will not detain the Senate very long; and yet I can see that the proposition as it comes from the House, or that of the Senator from Arkansas, is very likely to make some confusion in the administration of the pension accounts, which certainly are very satisfactorily managed, even if somewhat expensive, as the Senator from Kansas insists. I do not agree with him in that respect, however. The bill itself saves some $130,000 in the expense of administration in this particular over the previous year, although the pension-roll, as I have stated, has been increased largely and the amount of expenditure is considerably larger. It is for this fact that I have somewhat strenuously objected to the original proposition coming from the House, and I extend the objection to the amendment moved by the Senator from Arkansas. Inconvenience certainly must arise in emptying all these offices on a given day all over the country, inconveniences such as I have pointed out. Furthermore, if this proposition should be adopted, it can only be to run for a few years, because, as the Senator from Kentucky has said for another purpose, it is quite a number of years since the war closed, and the men who were wounded and disabled in the war, for that reason, as well as the lapse of time, are getting somewhat old; the rest of us who in those days considered ourselves young men have passed the meridian; and it may be a very serious question whether it is worth while to put in a permanent law a provision confining to a class of persons who are disabled and sick the appointment to an office where $30,000,000 is to be distributed annually, and is to be distributed for the next twenty years perhaps or the next thirty, or the next hundred years.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to ask the Senator whether if the second section as it came from the House became a law it would be any more binding on the Executive than the provision already in the Revised Statutes in section 1754?

Mr. SARGENT. In my judgment it would.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask the Senator whether in his judgment any attention has ever been paid by anybody to section 1754?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; and under this very office there are three notable instances out of eighteen. One-sixth of them at any rate have been appointed by the President of the United States under that section or in compliance with its provisions. But that relates only to wounded and disabled persons. More than that, the number of pension agents who were soldiers, wounded or otherwise, covers nearly all of them. One of them is the daughter of a deceased soldier—Miss Sweet, one of the best pension agents we have.

Mr. DORSEY. The amendment I have offered embraces the widows and daughters of soldiers; but this section of the Revised Statutes relates to all civil officers to be appointed by the Executive, and, in my opinion, it has been disregarded from the date it was put upon the statute-book to this time.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think so. I think it has been very largely observed, and it has been observed not only by the Executive in making appointments, but observed by the two Houses of Congress to a very large extent, and observed in every State, city, and county of the United States where such soldiers are to be found. You cannot go anywhere without finding more or less of these persons in office.

Mr. DORSEY. It is observed in political conventions.

Mr. SARGENT. Of course it has been observed in political conventions. It is not true that the officers of the country have been unjust or unfair to this class of persons, and this bill is an evidence of it. Here are $30,000,000 appropriated to pay pensions. Since the war we have given nearly $400,000,000 in pensions to soldiers. They hold now a great many offices. The Halls of Congress contain many of them, elected by the people. I say it is an aspersion upon the character of the eminent soldier who filled the Executive office for eight years, to assert that he neglected the dictates of humanity or the dictates of the law in this respect. I do not think my friend means to go so far. But at any rate, if what he says has been done, it has been done by a man all of whose feelings and sympathies were justly with that class of persons. He sent their names here for appointments abroad; I could name them. He employed them at home largely. They have been confirmed by the Senate over and over again, and have been confirmed at this session of the Senate for a good many offices, and they now fill a large number of these very offices. Therefore, I say that this section 1754 has been lived up to as fully probably as the interests of the country would allow.

Now, in order to show that the proposition of the committee, which in effect is in the same direction as this section 1754, was not intended as an evasion, was not, as was somewhat ungenerously stated, intended to evade the duty of meeting squarely in the face the proposition of the House, I want to remind you that this very section 1754 was passed in 1865, immediately after the war, when, if there could have been any feeling of fresh gratitude or sentiment in the matter, it was in full force. Congress at that time put a similar provision on the statute-book. What were they trying to avoid by that? Certainly not trying to avoid any duty, but simply to express a general principle, which they did express, and we ourselves come in in this bill and say that with regard to pension agents attention is called to that statute. That is all that the provision of the committee means.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether, in his judgment, the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to this bill if it becomes a law would change the law as it now stands, one way or the other.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it would, because there are qualifications.

Mr. DORSEY. I cannot understand that construction of the statute.

Mr. SARGENT. Very likely my friend does not understand it. If he will observe section 1754, he will find that there are qualifications placed there which are not put in the amendment of the committee. If you mean to say that the discretion of the President in making the appointment would require those very qualifications in fact, then I simply say he merely does his duty; nothing more can be assumed; but I say that the statute itself contains no such qualifications, but simply says that preference shall be given to those persons.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator knows that none of these officers can be appointed to fill these positions without fulfilling the requirements of this section; that is, they shall give their bond and they shall be competent. It would be simply impossible for them to discharge their duties for a single day without complying with the law in these respects.

Mr. SARGENT. Then, so far as the Senator goes beyond that in his amendment, it is unconstitutional, and I insist that picking out any class of persons and saying the offices shall be confined to them is unconstitutional; and the reply of my friend from Kansas to this is, "Is there anything wrong in appointing these persons to office?" That does not meet the constitutional point. Why can you not say a certain class of offices shall be confined to black men? The reply is, "Would not black men make good officers?" The answer is that there are millions of people who could fulfill the duties who are excluded. Is that a reply to a constitutional argument? The unconstitutionality is that a class line is drawn as to the qualifications of persons in whose favor it is drawn and discriminating against those against whom it is drawn. So if it was said you shall confine the appointment of certain officers to whites, it would be unconstitutional; or if you said Methodists only should be appointed to Indian agencies or pension agencies. Why would it be unconstitutional? Because by the effect of it it would exclude any but Methodists, and you have no right to limit the power of the President in making appointments among citizens of the United States by any such line. The distinction is entirely clear. It only relates to qualifications applying to all citizens, all being eligible having the qualification designated. You must not have an impossible one, as that a man shall be white or shall be black, which lays down a qualification that nobody except the person possessing it can aspire to. You say a man shall be learned in the law in order to fill a judgeship. Every man can qualify himself for that by becoming learned in the law, and there is no exclusion. It is a mere qualification for performing the duties of the office. But, to say that only white men or only black men or only French or English, or only wounded soldiers, or soldiers who were not wounded, or soldiers at all, shall fill the office, simply says that there is a certain class of persons who shall fill the office, and that is unconstitutional, and it is not answered by the question, "Well, is it not right to put soldiers in?"

Mr. DORSEY. I say everybody can qualify himself for holding a pension agency by going into the Army.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; because the rebellion is past. Neither could every man get wounded even if another war were to come. You have no right to require that the President shall only select men who have passed through the Army for certain offices, those men now being out of office. There is the unconstitutionality of it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me, in making the application of the general principle to this particular subject, to inquire how it is constitutional to impose upon the President the duty to make a preference of one class over another any more than to require him to make the appointment from that class?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think it is constitutional, strictly speaking. I think it is liable to criticism. It is not so clear that it is unconstitutional, but I would not like to affirm on my judgment as a lawyer that that is thoroughly constitutional or that it is not open to criticism. But where it is required that on a particular day all the offices shall be emptied and filled from a certain class of persons, I am satisfied that is a limitation of the power of appointment of the President which is unconstitutional. If the other is unconstitutional, then a law that was passed in 1865 in somewhat similar terms is liable to the same difficulty, and there being a precedent I estimated that in deciding whether it was constitutional or not.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I will hear my friend from Iowa.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It so happened that I was in this body in 1866 and 1867, when the Army was reorganized, and having some indistinct recollection of what occurred then I will refer to it here in the statute-book, if it will not interrupt the Senator from California too long. Among other things we provided that to the six regiments of cavalry then in service four should be added, and in regard to officering these regiments we provided that—

The original vacancies in the grade of first and second lieutenant shall be filled by selection from among the officers and soldiers of volunteer cavalry, and two-thirds of the original vacancies in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be filled by selection from among the officers of volunteer cavalry and one-third from officers of the regular Army.

This was long after the Army was disbanded. We provided for a certain number of additional regiments of infantry, and in officering them we made the same provision that a certain proportion of the officers should be selected from the disbanded volunteers and a certain proportion from among the officers of the regular Army.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator think that that stands upon the basis of the civil appointments we are now talking about?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let me get through and I shall try to show the Senator what I mean. We provided for national cemeteries, and among the provisions touching them is the following:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint for each national cemetery now established, or that may be established, a superintendent, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of an ordnance sergeant, to be selected from among the non-commissioned officers of the regular Army and volunteer forces who have received certificates of merit for services during the war.

Then we provided for assistant quartermasters. Touching them we provided that—

The vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious services as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

We provided for additional assistant surgeons in the newly organized Army, and compelled the appointment of persons who had served so many years in the volunteer Army to fill those vacancies.

Mr. SARGENT. Those provisions are all upon the same principle. The Senator need not detain me by giving them all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We provided for sixty paymasters in the Army—

With the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry, to be selected from persons who have served as additional paymasters.

It seems to me there is not a broad line of distinction between those officers and these. Take the case of a paymaster especially. We require officers to pay the existing Army, and suppose we say they shall be appointed from those who have served in the volunteer Army. We want men to pay the pensioners of the Army, and we propose to say that they shall come from men who have served as soldiers themselves. If there is a distinction, I confess I am not able to see it.

Mr. SARGENT. The distinction is broad enough between civil and military officers, as it is between civil and military organizations. The distinction runs all the way through in the appointment and in the government of them after they are appointed. The most the Senator could insist upon would be that by my argument the act from which he read was unconstitutional. If he insists upon that, I have no objection; it may have been an unconstitutional act.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from California will yield to me, I will suggest a modification of the amendment I offered to the amendment of the committee, which I suppose he will accept.

Mr. SARGENT. I cannot accept any amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. DORSEY. I propose to modify my amendment to the amendment of the committee so that, if modified, it will read:

That from and after the 1st day of October, 1878, the terms of office of the pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged Union soldiers or the widows or orphans of such soldiers shall be preferred for said offices.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There ought to be an executive session, and as it is getting quite late, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PADDOCK. We ought to finish this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope we may finish the bill to night.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the motion will be withdrawn, and let us finish the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. The friends of the bankrupt-law repeal are forcing back upon us and insisting that we must not take up too much time. I hope the friends of the bankrupt-law repeal will not insist upon going into executive session. If they do, and we take all day to-morrow with this bill, they must not blame us. We can finish this bill in a few more minutes, I think—it is nearly concluded—whereas if we adjourn until to-morrow all this argument will have to be gone over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we are to debate the propriety of proceeding to the consideration of executive business with open doors, I should like to say something myself.

Mr. SARGENT. I was not debating it; I was simply showing the condition of the business before the Senate and urging the argument of inconvenience to set aside the bill when its consideration is about finished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will debate the convenience of doing the things that the administration of government requires us to do in respect of affairs that cannot be alluded to here; and having made the motion my duty is done.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator has a right to make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. The question is first to be taken on the amendment to perfect the amendment of the committee. The amendment moved by the Senator from Arkansas is a substitute for the committee's amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. It is to strike out and insert, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is to strike out and insert. The proposition of the Senator from Arkansas is also to strike out and insert; that is, to strike out the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. We propose a substitute for the House section. To that there is now pending a motion to amend our substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] proposes a substitute for our substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands, as the Senator from California has stated, substantially, that the committee report to strike out and insert. The Senator from Arkansas moves to amend the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee. Is the chair correct?

Mr. DORSEY. The Chair in that respect is in error. I offered an amendment as a substitute for the substitute offered by the Committee on Appropriations. Afterward I desired to change the amendment as I first offered it, and I asked unanimous consent to modify it. There was no objection, and I did modify it, and it stands now as a substitute to the substitute offered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Chair that that is really a reversal of the ruling of the previous occupant of the chair. My amendment was received, on that point of order being made, the Chair ruling that it was proper to perfect the committee's text.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee being a substitute for the House provision, the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as modified, is an amendment to the amendment. The question will be first on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] to insert at the end of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee "or to the widows or daughters of such soldiers."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of what kind of soldiers; on which side? Does it make any difference?

Mr. HOAR. I will make it plain by inserting "Union" before "soldiers."

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts to use the word "orphans" instead of "daughters," so as to say "the widows or orphans of such soldiers."

Mr. HOAR. Sometimes the daughters support the wounded and disabled father.

Mr. INGALLS. The word "orphans" would include daughters as well as sons. The word "daughters" is obnoxious to the objection that has been made heretofore, that it provides for a class.

Mr. HOAR. I did not propose in making the amendment to let in the sons of soldiers, because if they are of age and able to fill an office of this kind they would not ordinarily be dependent on the parent for support.

Mr. INGALLS. An orphan is not necessarily a son.

Mr. HOAR. I therefore propose to confine the provision to the widow and daughter of the soldier. I did not require that the daughter should be an orphan, because there might be cases where a father would be dependent on her for support, and where she would fill the pension agency, he being alive but disabled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to add to the amendment of the committee the words "or to the widows or daughters of such Union soldiers."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One word as to the substitute proposed by the committee, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think the substitute is far preferable to the section as it came from the House in this particular: if the provision as it came from the House should be retained, on the 1st day of July all pension agents would have to be dismissed and their places refilled by disabled Union soldiers. That would create in the Pension Bureau considerable trouble. So says the Commissioner of Pensions. In fact he says he hardly knows whether the provision could be carried out. I believe his words were that he thought it impossible or impracticable to carry out the House provision. The amendment of the committee is in almost the words of the Revised Statutes. The committee followed that as nearly as practicable, so as to make the bill conform to existing law, and so as not to change the law. I think, if either proposition is to be retained, the amendment of the committee ought to be adopted, for the reason, if no other, that the Commissioner of Pensions thinks it would be almost impracticable to work under the section as it came from the House.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that, while I think the Revised Statutes very objectionable, the Revised Statutes have made it law that the qualifications shall be equal in the class from which the appointment is to be made to the qualifications of any other class which is not inserted in this provision or alluded to in any way.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I say it is not quite the language of the Revised Statutes, but in substance the provision is the same. The Senator from Kentucky will agree with me, I have no doubt, that as between the section as it came from the House and that proposed by the committee, the section as proposed by the committee is far better and is more practicable.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to say before this matter passes from before us that I am opposed to the provision of the House bill which is struck out by the committee, and I am also opposed to every amendment which has been offered. I see no necessity for keeping up a distinction between the citizens of this country in reference to appointments to office. I have as high regard for the soldiers of the country who bravely fought its battles as any Senator on this floor. I am willing to give them full credit for all their patriotism and for all their services to the country. I think the country has been liberal toward its soldiers. We have now a pension list amounting to about $30,000,000 annually; and here, after the expiration of twelve years, it is gravely proposed in the appointments to office to prefer the soldiers of the country to everybody else in the land. Sir, there is merit among the soldiers, and there is merit among the civilians of the country. I do not propose, so far as my action goes, to discriminate between citizens of this country, whether they be soldiers or whether they be civilians.

The soldiers understand all this thing. If I were a politician seeking to ingratiate myself with the soldiers of the country, I would perhaps stand on this floor and become their special advocate; but I am a plain citizen, and I want to deal fairly with everybody in the world, with the soldiers and with the civilians. Therefore I say we ought to be just as well as liberal. Why should we exclude any portion of the people of this country from the offices of the Government? Why should we ingraft upon this bill a provision which virtually excludes men of as much merit as any of the soldiers of the country?

Besides that, I do not shut my eyes to the fact that it is an attempt to limit the discretion of the President of the United States. The Constitution gives him the appointing power. Here is a proposition to limit the discretion which is vested in him by the Constitution and to control his action by saying that he shall appoint from a particular class of persons. I do not believe it is competent for the Congress of the United States to control the discretion vested by the Constitution in the President of the United States, and I shall not give my vote in that direction. No deference to the soldiers, however great that deference may be, can induce me to do that which in my honest judgment I believe I am not at liberty to do.

Therefore I shall vote against every amendment that has been offered, and I shall vote against the section as it came to us from the House.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that those Senators upon the other side of the House who are so very solicitous about the prerogatives of the Executive are much more anxious about the privileges of the next President than of the present incumbent. I am inclined to believe that they are unwilling to have any limitations imposed——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to say that I desire to see the Senator just to his own President.

Mr. INGALLS. That is what the Senate is trying to do at the present time. If the Senator from Delaware were anxious upon the subject of precedents, he would find that there are abundant instances where Congress has imposed limitations upon the power of the Executive to appoint. He is completely hedged about with restrictions that have been imposed by legislative power. Here in this very bill, as the Senator from Massachusetts alluded to it, we provide for a corps of examining surgeons. They are to be appointed by the Executive; and yet no one would say that it was an infringement of constitutional power to require that those men should be learned in physic. We provide for judges who shall be learned in the law. We provide that postmasters shall be residents of the locality where they are to exercise their function. But whenever it comes to making provisions to require the appointment of Union soldiers to offices that they can properly fill, there seems to be very great difficulty; some constitutional objection is continually interposed.

I am opposed to this whole system of legislation upon these subjects. At the other end of the Capitol is a House which is frequently alluded to as the House of confederate brigadiers. They have no constitutional scruples about declaring that Union soldiers shall administer the pension agencies of this country. The men who have served in the rebel army and have had their disabilities removed and have come to Congress pass a section in this bill expressly declaring that the powers and duties of these offices shall be exercised by disabled, wounded, and honorably discharged Union soldiers. But when the bill comes to the Senate, a portion of gentlemen of that faith and a portion of gentlemen of the opposite political faith come together in a body that is ostensibly republican and find a great many constitutional scruples about the power of the Executive to appoint Union soldiers to office.

Mr. HEREFORD. I should like to know of the Senator what he means by "ostensibly republican?"

Mr. INGALLS. Nominally republican.

Mr. HEREFORD. Not actually republican?

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator mean that there are any "nominal republicans" here?

Mr. INGALLS. History will declare what I mean.

Mr. BLAINE. It will vindicate you.

Mr. INGALLS. History will vindicate me. The Senate, nominally republican, takes a section that comes from the House, actually democratic. That body, controlled very largely by the sentiment known as the confederate during the war, have sent to us an open, manly declaration that these offices shall be discharged by wounded and disabled Union soldiers. I will not say that any of the Senators who differ with us in opinion are disingenuous and want to throw a burden upon a nominally republican body that they would not perhaps exercise in the other; but at least a sufficient number of them, with Senators of the opposite persuasion, find a great deal of constitutional difficulty about appointing soldiers to office.

Mr. President, I am tired of it. I want each body to assume its proper relation to the President and to this subject. If democrats and confederates, as they are called by the public press, can find no constitutional difficulty about this matter, it seems to me that we ought not to be particularly troubled upon the point. I certainly am not sensitive. I believe that Union soldiers are competent to discharge these offices, and since the House have sent this bill to us with this provision in it, I trust that we shall reject the amendment offered by the committee, that we shall reject the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, expressing in an indirect and inefficient way a preference for this thing, endeavoring to plow around the stump, and that we shall simply agree to the proposition as it came from the House. If it is unconstitutional to appoint soldiers to office, if they are disqualified to exercise the duties of pension agents, let the President decide it. I certainly am troubled by no scruples.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DORSEY. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to strike out all of the amendment of the committee proposed to be inserted in lieu of the second section after the word "that," and to insert:

> From and after the 1st day of October, 1878, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged Union soldiers, or the widows or orphans of such soldiers, shall be preferred for said officers.

Mr. TELLER. If in order, I move to strike out the word "orphans" and insert "daughters."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado proposes a verbal amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is inserted. The question now recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the question is put I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Pension Committee. He has given the subject a good deal of attention. I have not given the debate as much attention as I ought to have done, having been out of the Chamber during its progress. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether a fair construction of the House provision as it comes to us would require the President to vacate the offices so far as they are held by those not Union soldiers?

Mr. INGALLS. We must judge from the terms of the section. Of course the Senator from Maine can read the section without referring to me to obtain its meaning.

Mr. BLAINE. My question has no catch in it. I am after information solely. I will read the section as it passed the House:

> That from and after July 1, 1878, the office of pension agents shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

It occurs to me, without straining the construction at all, it would require that from and after that date no other than Union soldiers shall be appointed.

Mr. INGALLS. That is my construction of it; that when vacancies occur Union soldiers shall be appointed.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think the construction of the clause would vacate the office when it was held by another.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly not, but whenever vacancies occur in pension agencies they shall be filled by the class of persons named in the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The general scope that has been given to this provision in the country and I think in Congress was that it absolutely vacates, propria vigore, from that day forth, the office, no matter by whom held, if not by a wounded or disabled soldier.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And that is the scope given to the provision by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably that is the effect of it.

Mr. BLAINE. And the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] whose legal opinion always would have great weight with me, as it would with the country, nods that that is a fair construction of the provision. We ought to know exactly what we are voting on. If you intend that the operation of the section shall be a declaration that from and after the 1st day of July, which is less than sixty days ahead of us, every pension agency in the United States shall be instantly vacated by the incumbent and that the President's duty shall be to look around among the wounded and disabled soldiers, many of whom are capable of filling the office, and pick out eighteen of them, as there are only eighteen agencies in the country of that class, you ought to distinctly express it in the amendment, and not have any possible doubt about it.

Mr. DORSEY. I will state to the Senator that my amendment meets the point to which he alludes.

Mr. BLAINE. I was about coming to that point. I do not know whether I qaite agree with all of the Senator's amendment, but at all events it is not capable of being misunderstood. It distinctly says that on the 1st day of October proximo the commissions of all persons now holding these offices shall be vacated, and that they shall thenceforward be filled by no one except a wounded or disabled Union soldier or his widow or orphan. The Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] I believe, has amended that so as to strike out "orphans" and insert "daughters;" and both the Senators from Illinois nodded assent to that, because it has a peculiarly admirable local application.

Mr. TELLER. That was why I moved it.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator did it specially for the benefit of that State. All I want to know is exactly what we are voting for.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas says "shall be preferred for said offices." I do not think a declaration on our part that they shall be preferred amounts to very much. There is just as much objection to our saying that the President shall prefer a certain class of citizens, as to saying that he shall appoint a certain class. I therefore move to strike out the words "preferred for said offices," and insert in lieu thereof the word "appointed," and then it will be obligatory upon the President.

Mr. SARGENT. I would ask if that amendment is in order at this time? It is an amendment in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado is not now in order.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask my friend if he is not willing to add to his suggested amendment "those who formerly served in the army of the Potomac," or "those who formerly served in the army of the Cumberland." I ask him merely by way of argument, because if he can designate soldiers he can designate the army they served in. In other words, it illustrates in the clearest view the unconstitutionality of the whole proposition.

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt we might designate the army of the Potomac if we saw fit. Congress has repeatedly recognized the right to designate a certain class from which men should be taken to fill certain kinds of offices. Every State in the Union has recognized that principle, and does recognize it in its statutes and in its constitution. I think there is nothing at all in the objection that there is a constitutional inhibition in our way in this case.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. BECK. Would it be proper to suggest as an amendment that they shall be appointed from the white soldiers or the daughters of white soldiers, or colored soldiers, making the limitation a little broader?

Mr. TELLER. No, sir; I doubt whether that would be proper distinction.

Mr. SARGENT. Why not?

Mr. TELLER. This proposition proceeds upon the theory that there are some particular qualifications attached to this office which are not attached to other offices. There are other constitutional objections perhaps directly in the way of making the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. But the attention of the Senate has been called to the fact that this class of legislation has been had in the Senate and approved by the other branch and approved by the President. From the same class now that we propose to appoint pension agents, we appointed the men who guard the graves of Union soldiers in the Government cemeteries all over the land. I have not much doubt that the time is not very far distant when the constitutional lawyers in this body will find an objection to appointing them from that class, as they will find an objection to appointing that class of men to any office whatever.

As was suggested by the honorable Senator from Kansas, when the House, composed as he says, of confederate brigadiers, have the magnanimity to come here and say to us that they will take from this class of meritorious and deserving citizens, who by their education and by their experience are certainly entitled to the favor of the Government, to say nothing about their deserving merits, it does come with very poor grace, in my judgment, for a republican Senate to say, unless upon a plain inhibition of the constitutionality, that it cannot be done; and it comes with a bad grace when the statute-book is full of that same kind of legislation that we have been parties to heretofore.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask my friend from California, with whom I generally agree, on what he bases his constitutional objection?

Mr. SARGENT. On the ground that Congress has power to name the qualification to an office and the President in his discretion can judge whether the person has those qualifications or not, but you cannot name a class, because that excludes all other classes, and the appointing power of the President to civil offices is unlimited by the Constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. Can you not name a class by exclusion? Can you not exclude a class?

Mr. SARGENT. Not any more than you can say, for illustration, that only white persons or only black persons should be appointed, or only Methodists or Presbyterians.

Mr. BLAINE. Can you not say that no man who served in the confederate army shall not be a pension agent?

Mr. SARGENT. The Constitution of the United States as amended places certain disabilities upon them——

Mr. BLAINE. But after the disabilities are removed?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; I do not think you can.

Mr. BLAINE. It is there already; it is in the statutes to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I believe it is unconstitutional.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator has to fight what Congress has done, for the book is full of it.

Mr. SARGENT. I will fight that or anything else where it is necessary in order to arrive at what my convictions tell me is the truth. Because the Senator can show me that Congress, by its attention not being called to it, has made bad legislation in the past, I say the Constitution prohibits just that kind of legislation.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to throw anything in the debate in the way of the merit or demerit of the proposed legislation; but I am talking about its constitutionality. The statute-book, which I have my hand on now, declares that no man who served in the confederate army shall be an officer in the Army of the United States. Now, the vast number who served in the confederate army never had a disability imposed on them.

Mr. SARGENT. The Constitution of the United States imposed certain disabilities.

Mr. BLAINE. No.

Mr. SARGENT. And provided that Congress might remove by a two-third vote certain disabilities from confederates and those who were engaged in the war of the rebellion. Congress could by act remove all those disabilities or part of those disabilities. If it saw fit, while removing certain disabilities, to allow others to remain, its action still might be constitutional. But that is aside from the question here involved, where there is no forfeiture involved. Here are the citizens of the United States generally from whom the President of the United States, unless there is some disability resting on those citizens, has a right to make his selections for office. The Constitution says he may nominate. His discretion is complete so far as classes or individuals are concerned, and the only power of Congress in the matter is to prescribe certain qualifications which are attainable by all citizens. That is my view of the Constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. But, unfortunately for the Senator's argument, after the disabilities on the whole class were removed the Army bill which contains the exclusion was passed. The exclusion of the confederate soldiers from holding a commission in the Army was enacted after the disabilities had been removed from everybody at the South except certain classes.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator please read the section?

Mr. BLAINE. I know very well what the section is.

Mr. SARGENT. It is very much better when you are construing a statute to have the statute before you. I do not rest my argument, however, on the fact whether it is there or not. If that was class legislation, limiting the power of the President in appointments to office, then I say it was unconstitutional.

Mr. BLAINE. Was it unconstitutional, when the office of Attorney-General was created originally, that the President of the United States was limited to the nomination of one learned in the law?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; because that is a qualification.

Mr. BLAINE. It was a qualification of course in the judgment of Congress. They made it a qualification. Now we can make this a qualification.

Mr. SARGENT. By what authority?

Mr. BLAINE. Here comes a certain person who the Senator from Kansas says has a peculiar fitness for such an office as this, for the reason that men who suffered in the cause should be the ones to disburse the bounty and the recompense of the Government to their fellow-soldiers. It may or it may not be in the judgment of the Senator from Kansas or myself a requisite; but if the majority of Congress choose to make it a requisite, why does it not then become one binding upon the President?

Mr. SARGENT. Simply because it is class legislation instead of a qualification which any one can attain. The Senator, if he lives forever, cannot become a wounded soldier in the last war. If it was a qualification, it is put beyond his reach; and you have no right to put in the law a qualification for a general office which will exclude a part of the citizens of the United States. Any man who has sufficient brains to fill an office can get the qualifications, which consist in cultivation, in preparation for a profession, &c., and then answer for the proper administration of the office.

Mr. BLAINE. Another illustration——

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will please interrupt me in a parliamentary way.

Mr. BLAINE. I did.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; not in the middle of my sentence. Now I will yield to my friend.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator then maintain that if we were to-day with the Army bill before us it would not be competent to establish the office of Surgeon-General or of assistant surgeon of the United States Army and to require that the persons appointed should hold the diploma of some medical college?

Mr. SARGENT. I dare say that could be required, because it is a very simple matter of qualification; but the answer——

Mr. BLAINE. So this amendment——

Mr. SARGENT. Let me answer.

Mr. BLAINE. But I am not through yet. I will state my question, and then you can answer.

Mr. SARGENT. The course of the Senator is that he asks a question and then when a Senator is half through with the answer he bursts in with his loud voice. I do not yield to that sort of interruption of my answer. I simply say that while it might be proper to provide that a person should be a graduate of some competent college, it would not be allowable to provide that he should be a graduate of William and Mary College or Georgetown College, because that would be a class.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator had heard the whole statement of my question, he probably would have answered differently. Here is a dispute between two great schools of medicine, the allopathic and the homeopathic. I presume there is not a homeopathic surgeon in the Army of the United States. Does the Senator doubt that it is in the power of Congress to declare by law that the surgeons of the Army of the United States shall be graduates of a homeopathic college?

Mr. SARGENT. I doubt whether Congress have power to limit the discretion of the President in any such way. I think they have a right to require that persons shall have the legal or professional attainments to fill the office, but it must be left to the President to decide whether a person has them or not.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will give a little more rein to the definition, has not the law-making power the right to define the qualifications within which the President shall exercise his judgment?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. There, you come right down to it.

Mr. SARGENT. Everything in the way of qualification Congress has a right to prescribe; but it has no right to make a class a qualification.

Mr. BLAINE. But we do it all the time. I am not arguing now the merits or demerits of this proposition. I am not arguing whether it is right that a man who served in the confederate army shall not hold a commission in the Union Army. I am only saying that Congress has the right to declare so if it chooses. I am only saying that if Congress chooses to declare the pensions shall be paid by some one who served in the Army of the United States and was wounded and disabled, it has as clear a right to say it as it has to say that the Attorney-General or a judge of the Supreme Court shall be learned in the law.

Mr. SARGENT. And as much right to say that he shall have belonged to the army of the Potomac.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from California where he gets the right to pension the Army at all? From what clause in the Constitution does he get the right to pension wounded and disabled soldiers?

Mr. SARGENT. From the laws of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. But where does Congress get the right to pass a law to that effect?

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator has any doubt on the matter I will endeavor to instruct him, but I wish to inform him that I am not on the stand to be examined.

Mr. HOAR. No; it is merely his view that I wish to get.

Mr. SARGENT. Has the Senator any doubt on the subject?

Mr. HOAR. None in the least.

Mr. SARGENT. Then he does not need assurances from me that the power is possessed.

Mr. HOAR. I put the question to the Senator in all good faith, because the answer to it, if the Senator had made one, which he has not, would, it seems to me, have shown the foundation on which this whole legislation rests and must rest if it is constitutional at all. Nobody would claim, I suppose, the constitutional right to pension any class of citizens, to pension all the Methodists, to take the illustration of the Senator from Maine, or all the Universalists. It is not an equal law, and such an exercise of power must relate to all the citizens alike; but it is an incident to the creation of an army, and pensioned officers and soldiers retain their connection, wounded and disabled soldiers or any others like an officer retiring on half-pay retain their connection with the army. It is an old military usage existing long before the creation of the Constitution of the United States and existing in every military nation. Now, we have just the same right to impose upon this class of officers the right of performing the duty and to pay them for the performance of the duty incident to the pensioning that class of soldiers, that we should have to provide by law that you might assemble a board of retired naval officers to make certain examinations and pay them for those examinations. So I agree entirely with the Senator from California, that you cannot constitutionally, under the guise of prescribing qualification for office, make that qualification simply being a citizen of a certain class and nothing else; that you cannot provide, under the guise of making a qualification for the office of examining surgeon, that the surgeon should be a Methodist or that he should be a resident of Massachusetts, or that he should be a man worth a thousand or five thousand dollars, or that he should be a man who had done this, that, or the other thing in the past. And this provision cannot be maintained, as it seems to me, on the grounds on which some Senators have sought to place it; but it is maintainable on this ground: just as we have a right to provide that certain things shall be done by pilots, certain things shall be done by Army officers, certain other things shall be done by retired Army officers incident to military duty, we have the right constitutionally in pensioning the Army to say that the colonels, or majors, or paymasters now in active service shall perform this duty of paying the pensioners. These soldiers retain, like the soldier on half pay in England, a place in the Army of the United States; and to that extent, and it is only on that ground, we have a right to pension them at all.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, let me state one of the absurdities of this proposition. There are, I believe, eighteen of these officers. One of the eighteen is a gallant soldier who served through the entire war who is now one of the pension agents. He did not happen to be wounded; yet he served with great gallantry during the entire war. That gentleman by the terms of this bill would be displaced. He could not serve; he could not be a Commissioner of Pensions, he could not be a pension agent, because he did not happen to be wounded, and yet he served. General Grant did not happen to be wounded. He is not the less to be respected as a valuable officer. I apprehend this is full of absurdities. That is one of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not the question. The question first occurs on the motion offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Colorado was not in order, being an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Has the question been taken on the amendment I offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts has been agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the pending amendment reported.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move another amendment to the amendment of the committee. I move to strike out the words "wounded or disabled" before "Union soldiers," so as to read "or to the widows or daughters of Union soldiers."

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in line 5 of the committee's amendment the words "wounded or disabled," so as to read:

That hereafter in the appointment of pension agents the preference shall be given to Union soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the amendment of the committee as amended, which is—

That hereafter in the appointment of pension agents the preference shall be given to wounded or disabled Union soldiers, or to the widows or daughters of Union soldiers.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That from and after the 1st day of October, 1878, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged Union soldiers, or the widows or daughters of such soldiers, shall be preferred for said offices.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is this substitute now amendable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to this amendment is not in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to amend the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not now in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall vote against this substitute because it does not contain the words which I think ought to be in it, "wounded or disabled Union soldiers."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without expressing any opinion upon that point, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the words of this amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. It says that from and after the 1st of October, 1878, the offices of all pension agents shall expire, and so and so shall be appointed. The result of that would be as it strikes me, unless the executive department forces the construction, that after the 1st of October, 1878, and continually thereafter the office of pension agent shall expire all the time. If the object is to vacate these offices on the 1st of October, then you ought to say so and stop; but providing that they shall be vacated after that time continually the Executive would be obliged to change them every day. The Senator does not mean that, of course. I take it what he intends to do is that the offices shall expire on that day and then they shall be filled by so and so; but as he has got it stated I cannot vote for the amendment for it requires the Executive to appoint daily from that time forever.

Mr. DORSEY. I suggest to the Senator that he modify the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot modify it.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether it would not be better to have that date fixed at a time when the Senate is in session if these officers are to be confirmed?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a practical question. I suppose the pensions are payable on the 1st of October and quarterly. Now if the office of pension agent all over the country is vacated on the 1st of October, has every soldier got to wait for his quarter's pension until a new pension agent is selected, has given bond, and qualified? Will not that be a very great practical annoyance to the pensioners of this country who depend on the prompt payment of their pensions?

Mr. DORSEY. The answer I have to make is that it is the duty of the pension agent to pay all the pensions on the 1st day of September, and that gives a month to fix up the payments before the office is vacated; but if the executive department of the Government are as long in finding a pension agent for some points as they were in getting one for New York some time since they might have to do as was done in that case, have the Commissioner here pay the pensioners. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "from and after" in my amendment, so as to read "that on the 1st day of October" these terms shall expire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that modification of the amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is so modified.

Mr. SARGENT. Let it be read as now modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That on the 1st day of October, 1878, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged Union soldiers or the widows or daughters of such soldiers shall be preferred for said offices.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President——

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll and the name of Mr. ALLISON was called.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas if the 1st of January would not be a more convenient date than that mentioned in his amendment.

Mr. EATON. Is not my friend out of order?

Mr. HOWE. I do not know, indeed.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Iowa has answered to his name.

Mr. HOWE. I addressed the Chair before the roll-call commenced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin rose before any response was made.

Mr. HOWE. I respectfully submit to the Senator from Connecticut that no answer was made until I had addressed the Chair.

Mr. EATON. I thought there had been.

Mr. DORSEY. If the object of the Senator from Wisconsin is to have these changes take place when the Senate is in session, I have no objection to a change from the 1st of October to the 1st of January.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire further to modify his amendment?

Mr. DORSEY. I will change it in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification? The Chair hears no objection. The amendment is modified by inserting "January, 1879," instead of "October, 1878."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The 4th of January is the time the pensioners are to be paid, I think.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; the 4th of December.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then it would be just as bad.

Several SENATORS. No; no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That on the 1st day of January, 1879, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged Union soldiers or the widows or daughters of such soldiers shall be preferred for said offices.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will accept the amendment I suggested, and put in "wounded or disabled soldiers, their widows or orphans," and let that class of persons deal with the same class of persons who receive pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas further modify his amendment?

Mr. SARGENT. I object to any further modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope that every Senator who is in favor of the appointment of wounded and disabled soldiers in this connection will vote against this amendment, and let us have a vote on the proposition plain and square in some shape.

Mr. MAXEY. I am very glad indeed that the Senator from Kansas has suggested the proposition he has just stated, for the reason that I propose to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, and if found in the minority I should not be able to explain my vote. I vote against his amendment for the very reason that if we have to make a preference of one class of persons for this office or to express in a legislative way an opinion that nominations should come from a given class of persons, the better reason is that those who have by the fortunes of war been rendered unable to obtain their living like those who have all their faculties with them, then the bill as reported from the committee is the right theory in my judgment and the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas does not accomplish the object sought.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Arkansas is willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri to insert the words "wounded or disabled." I hope the Senator from California will withdraw his objection. It is hardly fair for him to interpose such an objection to the perfection of the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. As there are, I see, half a dozen Senators who monopolize all the love for wounded soldiers, of course I cannot object to yielding to their desire for such a laudable object. I have an impression that others who do not agree with them as to the constitutionality or the expediency of emptying these offices so suddenly may also have some regard for this class of persons. I may be in error in that respect, however; but I yield the guardianship of this class of people to those Senators who are so eminently qualified by their love of this class to provide for them. Therefore I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is withdrawn. The Senator from Arkansas proposes to modify his amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. I modify it so as to make it read "honorably discharged wounded or disabled Union soldiers."

Mr. SPENCER. And strike out "preferred" and insert "appointed."

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. And insert after "appointed" the word "forthwith." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this modification?

Mr. EATON. I object. Let us have a vote on the amendment as it was.

Mr. SPENCER. I rise to a point of order. I think it is too late to object.

Mr. EATON. Whether I am too late or not, I was answering the request of the Chair. The Chair asked if there was objection. I do not think the Chair will override himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I ask to have it reported as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That on the 1st day of January, 1879, the term of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged wounded or disabled Union soldiers or the widows or daughters of such soldiers shall be appointed to said office.

Mr. EATON. Those were the very words to which I objected "wounded and disabled" and "appointed."

Mr. TELLER. I asked for the modification to strike out "preferred" and insert "appointed." I understand that is not in.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to inquire if "honorably discharged" and "wounded" soldiers will not cover all cases?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut withdraw his objection?

Mr. EATON. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn and the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is modified as last read. The question is on the amendment as modified, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken I wish to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that the amendment, as now modified, if I comprehend it, simply postpones the House provision to the 1st of January and adds as a qualification the widows and daughters of wounded Union soldiers.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire why the Senator wishes to call my attention to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I call the Senator's attention to it for the purpose of ascertaining if he would not assent to the modification now inasmuch as it obviates one of the great objections urged by him to the passage of the original provision; namely, that these offices were suddenly to be vacated without proper provision being made for their being filled by other persons.

Mr. SARGENT. Part of the objection I had to that was that I did not think Congress possessed constitutional power to empty offices in order that they shall be filled by a certain class. So believing I cannot assent to it. I have no parliamentary power to assent at any rate. I represent a committee which instructed me in a certain way; I have made my report, and I am simply standing by my report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Dorsey,	McMillan,	Spencer,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Teller,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Oglesby,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hereford,	Paddock,	Wadleigh,
Cameron of Wis.,	Howe,	Plumb,	Wallace.
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Rollins,

NAYS—22.

Bailey,	Eustis,	Kernan,	Merrimon,
Beck,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sargent,
Booth,	Harris,	McCreery,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Hill,	McDonald,	Windom.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Matthews,
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Maxey,

ABSENT—27.

Armstrong,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Barnum,	Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Davis of Ill.,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Dennis,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gordon,	Mitchell,	Whyte,
Chaffee,	Grover,	Morgan,	Withers.
Christiancy,	Hamlin,	Patterson,

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. SARGENT. What will be the effect of that? To substitute that which is now adopted for the provision of the House bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the effect.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays on that. I think the House bill comes more directly to the point, and I prefer the House bill to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the question of agreeing to the amendment as amended, the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. DORSEY. Is not what we have just voted on a substitute for both the House section and the Senate committee's amendment? It is not an amendment to the committee's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. DORSEY. It was a substitute for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in the nature of an amendment. The Senate has not yet agreed to strike out the second section of the House bill.

Mr. INGALLS. A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible. This is a motion to strike out and insert. For the purpose of taking the question, the part to be stricken out may be amended, which was done, and the question now recurs under the rules on the motion to strike out the second section and insert the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. It cannot be divided.

Mr. SARGENT. That is very true, but I want to move to amend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion now is to strike out the second section of the bill and insert the amendment of the committee as amended by the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SARGENT. I want to move to amend section 2 of the House bill before that vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in order.

Mr. SARGENT. After the word "agents," in line 2 of section 2, I move to insert "in case of vacancy;" so as to make the section read:

From and after July 1, 1878, the office of pension agent in case of vacancy shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

I think it is very much better that the offices should expire naturally instead of being emptied by Congress, unless it is proposed to abolish the offices and not to reinstate them. The amendment, which has been adopted by a small majority and on which the vote is to be taken now as a substitute for the House proposition, suddenly abolishes all over the country the means by which $30,000,000 are to be paid. I believe that in itself is bad policy. It ought to apply only to cases of vacancy. If it is held by a majority of the Senate constitutional to require the President to appoint only from a certain class, then it may be that thereafter upon these vacancies naturally occurring the appointments shall be so made. It is certainly very much better that the officers should drop out here and there, one next month, and one in the course of the remainder of the fiscal year, and so on, and perhaps the last in four or five years, going out gradually without a shock to the system, than that suddenly on the 1st of October or the 1st of January they shall all expire. Senators should remember that here is a very important financial agency where a very large amount of money is paid out. These pension agents pay out on the average nearly $2,000,000 apiece. They give bonds for a quarter of a million dollars. Now it is proposed on a certain day, a little in the future I admit by this amendment, to suddenly vacate all these offices and do it all at once all over the country. It seems to me that it is bound to induce confusion.

The objection to the House bill was that it did two months from now perform this office. The amendment does not much improve it in that particular by saying it shall be done on the 1st of January, because there can not be anything done in the way of preparation for it. These men must continue to discharge the functions up to the last day. Every quarter they have to pay out their proportion of nearly $2,000,000 apiece. There can be no preparation for it. If the names could be now sent in to the Senate it could be considered whether we should confirm them or not, or if it could be done in advance of the expiration of the time there might be some propriety in it; but, on the contrary, these men have got to be in the active discharge of their duties away up to December. The 4th day of next December they are to begin to pay out each of them their proportion of $2,000,000 apiece, and they are to be hurried up in this work, and on the 1st of January go out of office, their heads suddenly to be taken off.

That is not good legislation; and the sentiment which is sought to be wrought up here in order to catch the eye in a certain measure of this class of persons throughout the country, is not a sufficient excuse for this thing. I stand here to combat and contest against a sentiment of that kind being suddenly brought in to endanger the success of this great machine by which so much of this money is paid out. Why do you say it shall apply to pension agents only? Simply because they deal with pensioners? That is not a good reason. Postmasters deal with pensioners; all their millions of vouchers pass through the post-offices. Why not provide in the great post-office bill that the office of postmaster shall be filled only by wounded or disabled soldiers, or by soldiers? Why not make it apply to all the various offices throughout the country? Why this sudden spasm in favor of requiring pension agents when there are only eighteen of them to be appointed from soldiers? Is it said that eighteen is their share of the offices of the country? Is that the proposition? Is there such an amount of enthusiasm on behalf of those who put this provision into our legislation to be generated when not one in one hundred thousand of the soldiers can get an office? Why I tell you the sop you throw to this Cerberus is here too small entirely. It does not satisfy the dog at all. The ravenous animal will not be satisfied with simply throwing at his feet eighteen offices scattered throughout the country, and when you come to consider that many of these very pension offices are now already filled by wounded and disabled soldiers, the number which you apportion out to them is very much less.

No, sir; let there be a general law requiring this with regard to postmasters, and you have twenty thousand of them, that they shall be filled by wounded and disabled soldiers, and then really, if it be necessary to do so, you will recognize adequately the claims of this class of persons. But I do not believe in any claims of any class so far as this is concerned. I do believe in their claims to pensions, and I am desirous that the machinery by which they are paid shall not be rudely disturbed or suddenly brought to a stand-still. I do believe in honoring them, and so far as they are qualified for office in giving them office, either by election or appointment; but I do not believe, considering the constitutional obligations which we are under, and the purity of the administration of the laws of the United States, that any class of persons have a right to come forward and claim that they shall be named and separated out from all the other citizens of the United States from whom selections for office shall be made. That I believe to be un-American, to be contrary to the very principles of liberty which those persons fought for.

Now, I say that with the alteration which I propose, the section of the House bill is robbed of its most obnoxious feature, which is retained in the amendment now proposed, and that is that these offices shall suddenly cease on a particular day. If, instead of that, when vacancies occur, you require the offices to be filled by these men, there is no sudden shock to the financial system by which $30,000,000 are annually distributed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend is correct—and I am not at all sure that he is not—it might be well for him to insert in his amendment a provision striking out the words "July 1, 1878," and saying:

From the passage of this act in case of vacancy—

So that the clause will apply whenever vacancies fall in after this act is passed. That will cover the idea better, I suggest.

Mr. SARGENT. I accept the modification, so as to make the section read:

From and after the passage of this act, the office of pension agent, in case of vacancy shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I made a motion—the first I believe that was made—to disagree to the amendment of the Senate committee and to strike out the second section of the bill as it came from the House. I do not want that overlooked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion suggested by the Senator from Kentucky is involved in the motion to amend.

Mr. BECK. Will the motion I made be in order after the section is perfected by amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be involved in the question of striking out. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the second section of the House bill, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the section so as to make it read:

That from and after the passage of this act, in case of vacancy from any cause, the office of pension agent shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

Mr. DORSEY. The result of that will be, if adopted, that there will not be a vacancy in five years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the second section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer the following amendment to section 2, after the word "soldiers," in the third line, insert:

Or the widows or daughters of such soldiers.

Mr. SARGENT. I think there will be no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I rose before the question was put on the last amendment with a view of moving to strike out the word "such" and insert "Union" in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator's amendment would limit the selection to the widows or daughters of wounded or disabled soldiers, and would exclude the widow of a soldier killed in battle.

Mr. McMILLAN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I want it to apply to the widow of any soldier.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota will be modified as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. DORSEY. I do not understand that the committee has any amendment. The amendment of the committee was voted down some time ago.

Mr. SARGENT. It is only the form of stating it. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas really.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to amend of the committee, which was amended by adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. The pending question is therefore on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The second section of the House bill, as amended, reads:

That from and after the passage of this act, in case of vacancy from any cause, the office of pension agent shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers or the widows or daughters of Union soldiers.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, is to insert in lieu of this matter the following words:

That on the 1st day of January, 1879, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged wounded or disabled Union soldiers, or the widows or daughters of such soldiers, shall be appointed to said offices.

Mr. SARGENT. Now, the effect of the vote will be this, as I understand: an affirmative vote will put the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas in the bill in place of that which has been in the bill and a negative vote will leave the second section as it has been amended.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand the section of the bill, it is intended to limit the power of appointment to persons who have been wounded or disabled while serving in the Union Army. I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas as amended to enlarge that limitation so as to include all honorably discharged soldiers. ["No!" "No!"] Let it be read. As read by the Clerk, certainly it says all honorably discharged wounded or disabled soldiers. One who answers either description of having been honorably discharged or having been disabled may be appointed under the amendment as it reads. ["No!" "No!"] Let it be read. I am opposed to the legislation. I think it is unnecessary; I think it is unwise; but still, if we are to have the power of appointment limited to soldiers, I prefer it should be limited to those who have been wounded or disabled, and the amendment as it now stands does not limit it to wounded or disabled.

Mr. DORSEY. Let my amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That on the 1st day of January, 1879, the terms of office of all pension agents shall expire, and thereafter honorably discharged wounded or disabled Union soldiers, or the widows or daughters of such soldiers, shall be appointed to said offices.

Mr. HOAR. I desire the Senator from Arkansas to accept the word "Union" instead of "such."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That requires unanimous consent. That has been voted in.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment as it now stands would exclude from the selection the widow of a Union soldier killed in battle, because of course he is not a wounded or disabled Union soldier. I desire consent to substitute the word "Union" for "such" before "soldier."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears no objection and the amendment is so modified. The question recurs on the amendment as amended, to strike out the second section of the bill and insert what has been read.

Mr. DORSEY. As I understand the text of the bill as amended, the only difference between that and the amendment which I have offered is that the text of the bill creates no vacancies at all but these places are to be filled by Union soldiers when a vacancy occurs, while my amendment creates on the 1st of next January a vacancy in all the pension agencies. That is the difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and at (five o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 6, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D. D. St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURGH.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial, signed by General W. S. Hancock, General H. G. Wright, General G. K. Warren, General H. W. Slocum, General A. Doubleday, General A. S. Webb, General C. K. Graham, General A. Shaler, General F. C. Barlow, and more than sixty other officers in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

To the members of the House of Representatives and Senate in Congress assembled:

GENTLEMEN: Your memorialists, formerly members of the Army and personally acquainted with the efforts of Mr. John B. Bachelder to collect and preserve the history of the battle of Gettysburgh, desire to testify to his wonderful success, and hereby affirm that in our opinion Mr. Bachelder has collected and now has more knowledge regarding that battle than any other man in America; and realizing the great loss to the country which its destruction or his death would bring (for the same information could never be collected by another) and the importance of immediate action in this case, your memorialists humbly pray that the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers "that Congress provide in some adequate manner for the publication of the data in question, as well as for additional copies of the maps," may receive your early and favorable consideration.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, which begins at sixteen minutes past eleven o'clock. This being Monday, the first business during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for bills and joint resolutions for introduction and reference to appropriate committees. During this call memorials and joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures are in order for reference.

Mr. SAMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the call of States and Territories be continued until all the States and Territories have been called.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARGARET DOODY.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4705) for the relief of Margaret Doody, of Exeter, New Hampshire; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN called for the reading of the bill; and it was read at length.

ATTORNEYS BEFORE THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4706) to provide for the protection of attorneys doing business before the Patent Office and other bureaus and Departments of the Government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN called for the reading of the bill; and it was read at length.

ALBA F. SMITH.

Mr. WAIT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4707) to extend for the term of seven years a patent, No. 34377, granted to Alba F. Smith; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. EICKHOFF introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4708) to regulate immigration; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE called for the reading of the bill; and it was read at length.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4709) to explain the Revised Statutes of the United States in respect to duties on imported merchandise; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE called for the reading of the bill; and it was read at length.

EMMA JANE FLEMING.

Mr. LOCKWOOD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4710) granting a pension to Mrs. Emma Jane Fleming; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

F. HUMMEL.

Mr. LOCKWOOD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4711) granting a pension to F. Hummel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN D. BAKER.

Mr. LOCKWOOD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4712) granting a pension to John D. Baker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COX, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4713) supplemental to the act of February 9, 1821, incorporating Columbia College, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL CONNELLY.

Mr. WARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4714) for the relief of Michael Connelly, of Chester, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN called for the reading of the bill; and it was read at length.

CORNELIUS ACKER.

Mr. BRIDGES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4715) granting an increase of pension to Cornelius Acker, Company B, Forty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. THOMPSON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) in relation to the Wood tariff bill; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move to refer this resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDEN. I move to amend so as to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations under the rule has nothing to do with this subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. This does not affect the revenues of the Government, but is an expression of opinion in regard to a measure which has already been considered by the Committee of Ways and Means. It seems to me entirely out of place to refer the resolution to a committee that has already acted upon the measure to which the resolution relates. I desire its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That all propositions to change or in any way modify our tariff laws are injurious and detrimental to the general welfare of the people; that inasmuch as the bill known as the "Wood tariff bill" is intended to radically change existing laws relating to import duties and thereby unsettle business and reduce revenue at a time when the finances will not bear diminution without serious detriment to the public service; therefore, it is unwise to waste time on the discussion on said tariff bill at present.

Mr. WOOD. This should undoubtedly go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 77 to be read.

Mr. PAGE. Would it be in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It would be; that is where the bill to which the resolution refers now is.

Mr. PAGE. I make that motion.
